ROLLING THUNDER: A JOURNAL OF DANGEROUS LIVING

ISSUE SEVEN, SPRING 2009

An editor who subsequently worked with the authors of the story beginning on

p. 43 brought to our attention that they are prone to inaccuracies. Suﬃce it

Anarchia

A disorder resulting from too much freedom,

first identiﬁed by physicist and professor Benjamin Rush. A devotee Christian, Rush was one of the Founding Fathers of the United States and is still regarded as one of the most important pioneers in the ﬁeld of psychiatry. In a review of the eﬀects, as he saw them, of the events of the American Revolution upon those who participated in it, he observed:

The termination of the war by the peace in 1783, did not terminate the American Revolution. The minds of the citizens of the United States were wholly unprepared for their new situation. The excess of the passion for liberty, inﬂamed by the successful issue of the war,

produced, in many people, opinions and conduct which could not be removed by reason nor restrained by government. For a while, they threatened to render abortive the goodness of heaven to the United States, in delivering them from the evils of slavery and war.

The extreme inﬂuence which those opinions had upon the understandings, passions and morals of many of the citizens of the United States, constituted a species of insanity, which I shall take the liberty of distinguishing by the name of Anarchia.

Antidepressants

Nowadays, it’s too much to ask to be happy. But for the right price, you can be anti-depressed!

On p. 14, it was alleged that the agent provocateur “Aara” was sleeping with one of the three young activists, including Eric McDavid, whom she managed to set up on conspiracy charges. This was based on faulty intelligence. Technically, the four were sleeping together in the wintery cabin she rented to them, but there seems to have been no sexual activity beyond Aara leading McDavid on. An innuendo to this same eﬀect appeared in the “Letters to fulllteriors” on p. 5 in issue 4; we’ve since learned better than to trust anarchist gossip, even regarding the machinations of the government.

That issue also included an oﬄine jab at Clamor magazine, which had un-critically run a screed from an avowed authoritarian communist excoriating

the publishers of Recipes for Diatribe—and this magazine—for not being authoritarian communists. Unfortunately, the publishers of Clamor showed no better business acumen than they showed editorial judgment, and the magazine collapsed immediately thereafter. Though we stand by our conviction that those who quote Mao approvingly do not deserve space in publications aimed at liberation, it was not our intention to bring Clamor to a sticky end by printing the witchhunts on p. 59.

On p. 3, it was stated that the expression “Quincy punks” derives from a British television show. In fact, the show was produced in the United States.

about this experiment are lost to history; no less space than a British soldier’s—an assertion out that a Bengali villager’s body occupies much more equally tight space and found that he could not.

There you have it—it’s not poverty or homelessness that causes people to become squatters, arsonists, or larcenists, but unrepairable windows. Similarly, Western thinkers as prestigious as Aristotle once believed in spontaneous generation—that aphids arise from the dew that falls on plants, fleas from putrid blood. “Those words and expressions are omitted which ungrateful hacks doubt the landlord would have been thrilled if he could have packed his tenants as tight as his countrymen had once packed the British, so as to extract a greater value from his property. There are still black holes in Kolkata and elsewhere around the world, into which disappear the millions who live and die in abject poverty; but their deaths, unlike those of British colonists, go unrecorded.

Legend has it that a Bengali landlord, convinced that Holwell had been exaggerating, his colleague Daniele Ricciarelli was hired to do the owner's neighborhood, accompanied by their husbands, wives, and children. They tear down the fences of his gated community and pour through its quaint streets, a riotous torrent clamoring for vengeance. The security guards withdraw in fear as the mob approaches; by the time it reaches his house, the owner is long gone.

In an interesting twist, ever since the WTO protests of 1999, anarchists appear to be operating on the same premise: if only a few windows can be broken, revolutionary struggle is bound to escalate.

“Then you to a duel.”

For Good or for Ill, the protests at the Democratic and Republican National Conventions constituted the most significant nationwide effort anarchists have undertaken to organize militant action in the US in several years. Two weeks later, the global economy collapsed, followed shortly by anarchist-initiated rioting in Greece dwarfing anything in Denver or St. Paul. It’s easy to feel that the DNC and RNC mobilizations were inconsequential by comparison. But if US anarchists are ever going to be capable of contributing to insurrections like the ones in Oaxaca and Greece, we either have to figure out how to improve on the models applied to determine and coordinate their own strategies and tactics, and made breakthroughs in establishing solidarity with other groups—as exemplified by the historic St. Paul Principles. They also debated communications structures that had not previously been applied at mass mobilizations, which have since been cited by the US military and utilized during the riots in Greece. Just as the global indymedia network came out of the Seattle WTO demonstrations,* the DNC/RNC mobilizations produced the Bash Back! network† and plenty of other projects and momentum that continue to the time of this writing. Proportionate to the number of participants, the mobilizations were surprisingly successful.

* Some critics pose a false dichotomy between building radical infrastructures and focusing on mass mobilizations; in fact, the latter often produce the former.
† Bash Back! came out of a Midwest anarchist consult in November 2001, initiated by queer anarchists who felt that there hadn’t been sufficient space for radical queer and trans participants at earlier demonstrations. Months after the conventions, Bash Back! groups were making headlines with provocative actions, and the network continued to spread across the US.

The question, then, is whether they provide a model that can be expanded on. The conventions revealed the risks of initiating a mobilization so far in advance: by the time the event finally occurs, the context may have changed dramatically. Likewise, so much preparation can raise unrealistic expectations; it also invites serious repression and intelligence gathering from the authorities. One might ask whether the US anarchist movement can sustain such costs; on the other hand, one might also ask whether it can afford to remain a marginal participant in others’ campaigns, as it was throughout much of the past decade. This brings up the most fundamental question: was the explicitly anarchist character of the mobilization a fatalizing organizing factor, or a starting point towards building a bigger and more independent anarchist movement in the US?

Can we go it alone? Are we better off in the shadows? Or is there another way?

Prehistory: The Rise and Fall of the Anti-War Movement

The so-called “anti-globalization movement,” named by corporate media with a vested interest in obscuring the possibility of modern-day anticapitalist struggle, emerged as if from nowhere in the late 1990s. In fact, it was the convergence of a wide variety of smaller social currents ranging from indigenous liberation struggles to the do-it-yourself punk scene, all of which had been quietly developing over the preceding years. Perhaps the most surprising accomplishment of the movement was to re-vitalize street-level conflict, which many had deemed irrelevant in the postmodern era.

The US wing of this movement was not prepared for the sudden changes wrought by September 11, 2001; although the militant anti-IMF protest organized for that month became the first antiwar protest, anarchists swiftly lost the initiative to liberals and communists more familiar with reactive single-issue organizing.

To the glee of authoritarians of every stripe, the convention protests were not a stunning victory, but they set valuable precedents in coordination, strategy, and infrastructure. Perhaps the greatest danger is that, because they were not an unqualified success, they will have been forgotten by the time of the next mass mobilization.
between 2001 and 2003 the antinuclear movement replaced the anticapitalist movement in the public eye. The antinuclear movement of the following years failed to step into the war, but succeeded in taming protest itself. Considered as a whole, the worldwide demonstrations on February 15, 2003 comprised the most widely attended protest in human history—and yet they did nothing to hinder the Bush administration. One might say it was a triumph of co-optation that so much outrage and motivation was diverted into ineffectual rituals so soon after anticapitalists had demonstrated the power of direct action. To be fair, the effectiveness of the efforts of 1999-2001 did not become clear until years later to or capable of accomplishing its professed objectives, and this is doubly true of people with limited resources who are all too familiar with being exploited for others’ gain. There were efforts to recruit labourers and peoples of color, but these rarely created mutually beneficial collaboration and dialogue. It could be charged that organizers sought to involve a wide range of demographics in order to present the movement as diverse, while still endeavoring to control its content and direction. Approaching the antinuclear movement as an opportunity to create a mass under liberal leadership, rather than as a means of fighting the war machine, actually undermined the possibility of it ever adding up to a durable, empowered mass.

By the middle of Bush’s second term, public sentiment was acknowledged to be overwhelmingly against the war, and yet the antinuclear movement had effectively collapsed. The tactic of mass mobilization, which liberals had hijacked from radicals, had accordingly been abandoned; protests still occurred, but none drew numbers worthy of the word “mass.” By 2008, liberal politics beyond the voting booth had been completely defined by the failure of the liberal movement. Liberallogic once again planned on electoral politics, and the streets were as quiet as they had been in the mid-1990s when neoconservatives crowded that capital confidence as “[dead] the end of history.” This was the context in which anarchists prepared to go to Denver and St. Paul.

Genesis
The DNC/RNC mobilizations got started in a relative vacuum. In 2003, when organizers first decided to focus on them, few nationwide events were bringing people together for militant struggle or putting anarchism in the public eye. After the rise and fall of anti globalization “summit-hopping” and the resulting backlash, reverting to the mass mobilization model was something of a failure of imagination. This was further complicated by the fact that the February 15 demonstrations had blocked ports or smashed recruitment center windows! Some have charged that the antinuclear movement failed because it was not empowering for the working class or people of color. This is a half-truth: the antinuclear movement failed because it was not empowering for anybody. The groups that dominated it did all they could to limit the tactics and strategies of participants to the lowest common denominator. Few will stick preparing for the conventions, it was easier for others to do the same. Taking a cue from the Disent network that had organized against the G8 summits in England and Germany, the WC organized a “Pre-NC” planning conference exactly a year before the RNC. For many younger anarchists not yet entirely clear on the distinction between straty and tactics, this was itself an educational experience; despite the resultant challenges, a blockading strategy emerged for the first day of the convention, relying on a diversity of tactics.

Once this element was in place, the RNC mobilization gathered momentum steadily. Groups around the country signed on to the invitation down the convention, and an Unconventional Action paper circulated advertising the strategies for both St. Paul and Denver. All this helped build confidence in the protest.

The DNC mobilization got off to a shakier start. Many Denver radicals were less enthusiastic about taking on the police state. Recreate 68, a leftist umbrella group, took the initiative to begin organizing, but it took longer for explicitly anarchist coordination to pick up steam. Early gathering in Denver drew fewer participants than those in St. Paul, and the goals of the mobilization seemed less clear. As the DNC drew nearer, a split occurred in R68; meanwhile, Unconventional Denver gained momentum with local participants, and pulled together a week-long schedule of themed events. The people who organized in Denver took on dissproportionately more work, with fewer people being assigned the tasks in the Twin Cities; but in fighting this uphill battle, they enabled anarchists to frame the mobilizations as a rejection of rep-resentational politics itself, rather than just the Republican Party.

Both Unconventional Denver and the Welcoming Committee met regularly, establishing committees for logistical work and maintaining informative websites. Members of the WC at the Twin Cities were already focusing on the

and the streets were as quiet as they had been in years that it was time to find something more effective, without ever presenting a concrete alternative that could fill the same role.

It’s important to remember that when the conventions were first chosen as a target, it was not yet clear that the antinuclear movement was on its last legs. The previous two election years had both included fierce protests at the Democratic and Republican National Conventions, with plenty of anarchist involvement but little serious advance organizing. Hundreds of thousands of protesters, including thousands of anarchists, had participated in the 2004 RNC in New York, though there had been little coordination or common strategy for anti-authoritarian groups with this missed opportunity still fresh in people’s minds, it was unreasonable to expect the upcoming DNC and RNC might offer another chance in a similar context.

To this end, starting in a couple communities and spreading slowly across the country, small knots of anarchists began to discuss the conventions. In the host cities, these coalesced into the RNC Welcoming Committee and Unconventional Denver; nationwide, a network of

ad hoc collectives emerged under the moniker

Unconventional Action. From early on, most agreed that there should be a generalized stratey for direct action and an anarchist-organized infrastructure. Some also argued, drawing on examples from earlier mobilizations, that it was important for direct action to start on the first day of the conventions and coincide with other protests, rather than occurring at a separate time.

Buildup
For many, their first exposure to the organizing was a humorous video short from the RNC

Welcoming Committee, depicting masked anarchists engaging in everyday activities throughout the Twin Cities and ending with the words

“We’re getting ready.” Later, humorless state and federal investigators referenced this video during interrogations and presented it at felony trials. When it appeared in August 2007, it showed radicals around the country that organizers in the Twin Cities were already focusing on the RNC and were resourceful and clever to boot.

Similarly, the first groups that appeared under the Unconventional Action banner didn’t just put out a general call for organizing against the DNC and RNC, but went ahead and held consultas in their own communities. Once it was clear that some people were already when many were no longer paying attention.

There were scattered efforts to apply direct action in antinuclear efforts, such as the targeting of recruitment centers and ports engaged in military shipping, but these were too little too late. Imagine the effect if a mere tenth of the people who demonstrated in Denver in February 15 demonstrations had blocked ports or smashed recruitment center windows!

The St. Paul Principles

For years leading up to the conventions, mass mobilizations had been plagued by conflicts between advocates of direct action and other protesters; in some cases, pacifists and authoritarians had attacked militants or actively collaborated with the police against them. The RNC Welcoming Committee took steps to ensure that this would not happen in St. Paul. In February 2008, the Welcoming Committee and Unconventional Action Chicago joined a range of other groups, including the Coalition to March on the RNC and Stop the War and the Anti-War Committee, in drafting an agreement across ideological and tactical lines.

- Our solidarity will be based on respect for a diversity of tactics and the plans of other groups.
- The actions and tactics used will be organized to maintain a separation of time or space.
- Any debates or criticisms will stay internal to the movement, avoiding any public or media denunciations of fellow activists and events.
- We oppose any state repression of dissent, including surveillance, infiltration, disruption and violence. We agree not to assist law enforcement actions against activists and others.

This agreement helped to legitimize the anarchists in the eyes of other organizers—which in turn saved anarchists needless internal bickering over whether or not they were “respecting the local community,” a frequent stumbling block at mass mobilizations. Even after the RNC, organizers of many stripes respected the St. Paul principles, refusing to denounce or inform on militant activists.

Attendance

After all the promotion, where was everyone? The permitted march at the RNC was scarcely a tenth the size of the one in New York four years earlier; there may have been about as many hard-core militants as there had been at prior conventions, but nothing like the numbers imagined by those familiar with the high point of the anti-globalization era. Several factors probably contributed to this. The conventions occurred away from the coasts, where the majority of radical communities were located. Some had hoped that the resurrected Students for a Democratic Society would organize a great deal of youth participation, but this did not occur on a national level. As anarchists had established their own social circles over the preceding years, their presence had decreased in sub-cultural milieux such as the punk scene, which may have resulted in lower attendance from those demographics. The high price of gasoline may have discouraged others.

Though some diehards showed up to play logistical roles, the generation of anarchists that had been instrumental in the mobilizations from Seattle to Quebec. City largely stayed home. One might hypothesize that in this regard, the anarchist movement was still paying off bills from the anti-globalization days: many veterans of that era were still nursing their bitterness, or else tied down by new responsibilities, while many younger anarchists who never participated in a mass mobilization had been turned against them by the lingering backlash. In the buildup to the conventions, impressive new networks were established, but the failure to rebuild the old networks proved costly, as did the general lack of training and experience.

Meanwhile, the NGOs that had been so important in the anti-globalization movement were nowhere to be seen, and the liberal coalitions that had provided the bulk of the anti-war movement were drastically eroded. As mass mobilizations and traditional civil disobedience had produced diminishing returns, many NGOs had shifted away from them; now, without the older generation of anarchists involved, many connections with these groups had been lost.

It wasn’t clear until months later just how dramatically the Obama campaign had affected the context, drawing people away from grassroots organizing and into voter registration and similar activities. Certain self-described anarchists who said they envied Obama’s campaign for its success in mobilizing the masses failed to point out that it flourished to the same extent that our fair-weather allies disappeared. Reformist cooperation is a weapon against popular autonomy and self-determination no less than the tear gas of riot police. On the other hand, this made it all the more important that anarchists emphasize possibilities beyond the voting booth, and in this regard we could have done worse. All this underscores the generosity of the longtime activists from outside our immediate August 24-28: The Democratic National Convention

People began to trickle into the convergence center in Denver in mid-August. Saturday night, August 23, was the first thickly attended spokesperson council; Unconventional Denver spokesperson appraised a full room of predominantly young anarchists of the various permitted and unprompted events scheduled for the week, noting to applause that all UD events were unpermitted. The liberal antiwar march the following day was unexpectedly small. An energetic anarchist-organized Reclaim the Streets march took off on its heels, however, crisiscrossing downtown for hours and attracting a wide range of participants. Even after the march reached its destination, at which a standoff with police ensued, it spontaneously started again; police eventually attempted to corral it between intersections, but the participants escaped through a parking deck. In retrospect, this was perhaps the only action of the entire DNC/RNC mobilization that was an uncomplicated success. The organizers had correctly predicted that police would be hesitant to attack a mixed crowd the day before the convention, when Code Pink and Iraq Veterans Against the War were also in the streets; this helped to get the whole mobilization off on the right foot.

Back at the convergence center that evening, people reorganized to plan an action targeting party fundraisers the following night. In example of how large meetings can get stymied in irrelevant deliberations, it didn’t come out until well into the discussion that practically everyone involved also planned to participate in the black bloc called for 6 pm Monday. There had been no planning to speak of for the black bloc, and at that point it was too late. R68 had reserved Civic Center Park downtown, which hosted one a $170,000 settlement.

Over the following year, the government sent multiple undercover snatch squads roamed in unmarked cars, kidnaping organizers wherever they could be found. One legal worker stepped into a courtroom to support an arrested friend, only to be detained and interrogated by Bob Fletcher himself. Andrew Dart, the federal informant who had spent months inside the WC as “Panda” (see p. 2 of this magazine), invited an organizer to meet him in a public place and identified him to a snatch squad by embracing him—unwittingly mimicking Judas, who identified Jesus to the Roman soldiers by kissing him. § Taken as a whole, this was a higher level of repression than had occurred at a mass mobilization in the US in several years. Convergence center raids are not uncommon, the total number of arrests had been higher at the 2004 RNC in New York, and the goal of targeted arrests was initially set higher at the 2000 RNC in Philadelphia; the house raids and snatch squads were more unusual, though preceded by ISAG. But the felony charges brought against the organizers who became known as the RNC

Like Denver, the Twin Cities had never seen a mobilization of this scale; it was a new challenge for anarchists and city officials alike. Although government repression increased to new levels in the months leading up to the RNC, there were precedents within recent memory hinting at what to expect. A decade earlier, the Minneahaha Free State—a 18-month anti-road occupation in Minneapolis—had been infiltrated, harassed, and raided multiple times by hundreds of officers. § In July 2000, during protests against the International Society for Animal Genetics (ISAG), over one hundred people were brutally mass-arrested, and organized inexperienced violent house raids and snatch arrests. It should not have been a surprise when these tactics reoccurred eight years later.

After public outcry following the ISAG arrests, the Minneapolis City Council enacted new laws governing police treatment of protesters, but these were repealed in advance of the RNC. The cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul also passed a host of new laws regarding permitted and organized protests, and broke out one that had never been—the now-infamous “crimes committed in furtherance of terrorism” provision of the Minnesota PATRIOT Act, which defines terrorism broadly enough to encompass acts of disordered anarchy.

In August 2007, the night before the pRe-NC began, police from several departments attacked the monthly Critical Mass bicycle ride in downtown Minneapolis, beating and arresting 19 people and excusing a Department of Justice office, which never occurred. That evening, rebellious young people seemed much more desirous of conflict with the authorities than organized anarchists seemed prepared to facilitate it. Tuesday saw anarchists scrambling to do jail support; arrestees’ court dates were all scheduled for September 2, an obvious attempt to paralyze those committed to both mobilizations. Wednesday, hundreds participated in an antigovernment enviromental march; meanwhile, at the convergence center, at which a police raid had been feared all week, warrantless police arrested people outside and used a bullhose to destroy signs and banners in the parking lot. Later that day, Rage Against the Machine headlined a show that ended with anarchists support- ing Iraq Veterans Against the War in an unpermitted march to the convention center. Further confrontations with the police did not occur, though perhaps this was for the best with the RNC around the corner.

Afterwards, one UD organizer regretted that the mobilization did not produce common cause with other locals against the inequities of capitalism and white supremacy; in this regard, it may have been a missed opportunity to test new strategies for resistance in the Obama era. Despite fears, however, media coverage did not misrepresent anarchists as racists, and locals on the streets seemed to be sympathetic—an important point of reference for future efforts. Whatever its shortcomings, this mobilization in Denver succeeded in achieving some visibility and built up momentum for the RNC without inflicting unsustainable costs. As the week wound to a close, vehicles parked with anarchists set off for St. Paul.

Pre-Emptive Repression in the Twin Cities

Undercover police officers and federal informants to infiltrate the WC. The long buildup to the convention and the transparency of the WC enabled the state to gather tremendous quantities of intelligence. In the weeks before the RNC, police blatantly tailed and photographed organizers, stalked out their houses, and attempted to question them. They also detained and harassed perceived anarchists, photographing them and searching and seizing their belongings and vehicles. Some of those photographs were later used to identify arrestees who would not give their names.

On Friday, August 29, the Ramsey County Sheriff’s Department raided the WC convergence space. They detained several dozen people, including a five-year-old child, face down at gunpoint while they searched the building, taking everything from computers to children’s artwork. The following morning, police raided three houses, arresting four organizers, handcuffing and questioning dozens more, and seizing a great deal more material. The seized items were used as props in a press conference at which Sheriff Bob Fletcher implied that they were dangerous weapons. Two other houses were raided in the course of the RNC: in one case, a federal informant had entraped an unfortunate protestor into making Molotov cocktails; the other raid was conducted on a space occupied by videographers.

Throughout the following days, undercover snatch squads roamed in unmarked cars, kidnaping organizers wherever they could be found. One legal worker stepped into a courtroom to support an arrested friend, only to be detained and interrogated by Bob Fletcher himself. Andrew Dart, the federal informant who had spent months inside the WC as “Panda” (see p. 2 of this magazine), invited an organizer to meet him in a public place and identified him to a snatch squad by embracing him—unwittingly mimicking Judas, who identified Jesus to the Roman soldiers by kissing him. § Taken as a whole, this was a higher level of repression than had occurred at a mass mobilization in the US in several years. Convergence center raids are not uncommon, the total number of arrests had been higher at the 2004 RNC in New York, and the goal of targeted arrests was initially set higher at the 2000 RNC in Philadelphia; the house raids and snatch squads were more unusual, though preceded by ISAG. But the felony charges brought against the organizers who became known as the RNC...
8—all of whom were indicted on “conspiracy to commit riot in furtherance of terrorism,” among other charges—were unlikely since the 1968 conspiracy trial following the DNC in Chicago.

None of this could derail the momentum of the organizing, however. The strategy for September 1 had been established far in advance, and scores of autonomous groups had already prepared. If anything, the raids and persecution made the public more sympathetic to the anarchists on the eve of the demonstrations.*

Final Countdown

Despite the raids and arrests, sleep-deprived organizers eventually forced the city to reopen the convergence center, and on Saturday night hundreds of anarchists from around the country gathered for a spokescouncil. As in Denver, the meeting ended in a tiresome circular discussion, but in this case, because the strategizing was already complete and even the start time of the blocking had been set at a less crowded spokescouncil the previous Wednesday, this focused harmlessly—if irrelevantly—on how the actions of September 1 would conclude.

Perhaps the most important thing that occurs at gatherings like this is not the centralized decision-making, but the experience of collective power and determination. There’s nothing like the feeling of being in a space with hundreds of comrades who have come to risk everything in the struggle against oppression; it is utterly unlike daily life in the US. At the beginning of the meeting, as the spokes-ersons of dozens of affinity groups introduced themselves and stated their intentions, the atmosphere was electric. After all the expression of the preceding days, just being present was an act of courage and defiance. Comrades who hadn’t seen each other for years, perhaps not since they had last fought side by side, embraced or nodded to one another in passing. Those moments of connection, and the indomitable will to resist that made them count, were themselves a sort of victory.

The following day, everything was suddenly up in the air again. As news came in that another hurricane was headed for New Orleans and rumbles circulated that the RNC might be cancelled, preparations ground to a halt around the city, as all eyes focused on the convergence center at which another spokescouncil meeting would take place. After the Republicans announced that they would hold only a shorter and less attended afternoon session, the spokescouncil agreed that the blockades would go forward, picked a new time to meet for them, and split up so affinity groups could hastily reconize their plans. Throughout the Twin Cities, police cars prowled and sirens swelled, while paranoid activists wondered whether they would even be able to get downtown the following morning.

September 1: The Big Day

At 11 a.m., the Coalition to March on the RNC and Stop the War rally kicked off at the capitol, while three miles away police maintained Maclester students from leaving to march to the rally site. Meanwhile, anarchists all over the city were getting into position as a large number of downtown. This led to a large confrontations between anarchists and law enforcement along Kellogg. During these confrontations, MFF officers used less-than-lethal weapons. Facing MFF pressure, the anarchist groups engaged police in a game of whack-a-mole, in which police were always chasing, but never controlling, the anarchists.

Shortly before 3:00 p.m., MFF units gathered south and east of the Landmark Center and began moving at an accelerated rate of downtown. This led to a large confrontations between anarchists and law enforcement along Kellogg. During these confrontations, MFF officers used less-than-lethal weapons. Facing MFF pressure, the anarchist groups engaged police in a game of whack-a-mole, in which police were always chasing, but never controlling, the anarchists.

The anarchists on Shepard Road were driven west to a park near Chestnut Road. At that location, the anarchists merged with a crowd of bystanders. The MFF units surrounded and detained the entire crowd.

* This has continued since the RNC demonstrations. Older Twin Cities progressives are particular proponents of direct action organizations.

police; in the southwest and northeast, two new hard blockades were in place.

Between 1 and 2:30 p.m., a breakaway march departed from the Funk the War march, while the black bloc was joined by many from Bash Back! All over town, windows were smashed, squad car tires were slashed, and delegate buses were swarmed. Police responded with horse charges, pepper spray, tear gas, and rubber bullets. By 2:30, the permitted march had returned to the capitol and the Macalester student march was finally on its way. Shortly before 3, the police dispersed the breakaway march, and hundreds of anarchists headed to the capitol to regroup, quieting the north part of St. Paul.

Meanwhile, near the Excel center on Kellogg, protestors were roving from intersection to intersection in increasingly large groups; many participants in earlier actions joined the Pagan Cluster and Funk the War there. After calls for reinforcement went out over the comms system, the anarchists who had regrouped at the capitol began to march west around the perimeter fence in the second Anticapitalist Bloc of the day. Within the hour, the police utilized tear gas, pepper spray, concussion grenades, and marker rounds to clear the area around the Excel center, pushing the Funk the War bloc east and bringing out the National Guard to hold the ground they had retaken. Around 4 p.m., police illegally raided the communications office; the arrestees were originally held on probable cause for felonies, but were released without having been charged. Meanwhile, the new Funk the War bloc dragged barricades into the street in the course of its retreat, then split up; some participants were mass-arrested in northeast downtown, while others traveled west on Shepard and still others safely dispersed.

Late that afternoon, over 200 people were corralled at the intersection of Shepard and Ontario, and most were mass-arrested. Most of the detainees were simply there to attend the “Take Back Labor Day” concert on Harriet Island. In all, downtown St. Paul witnessed over ten hours of running confrontations. After the initial blockades and marches were broken up, protestors repeatedly found new convergence points such as the Funk the War sound system. That night, at a spokescouncil hastily convened on a college campus, a few dozen exhausted participants compared notes and discussed plans for the following days.

Communications

The group that had formed to coordinate communications opted to use Twitter to distribute SMS messages to participants, as the txt.mob system used at the 2004 RNC had sometimes suffered significant delays.* The comms team established user groups around themes such as food and police activity, including one for each sector, so people could sign up to receive information only about subjects that concerned them. Scouts on the ground reported back to a communications hub at which reports were verified and sent out.

* There were also security concerns, as txt.mob records had been subpoenaed in subsequent court cases.

After the raid on the comms space, the Cold-snap Legal Collective’s Twitter became the de facto comms system, as people called the jail support hotline to report unfolding events and legal workers passed these on to the public. On Friday, August 29, only 23 people were following Coldsnap Legal; a week later, over 1800 depended on it for news updates.

In some situations, the comms system enabled groups to evade police attacks and disperse safely. Others users complained that the flow of information was overwhelming and it was hard to make practical use of it on the streets, especially after the comms hub was raided and everyone was depending on Coldsnap’s single feed.

September 2-4: Continued Confrontations

As hoped, the events of September 1 set the stage for the rest of the week, emboldening protesters and causing police to behave irrationally. On Tuesday, just as the permitted Poor People’s March was concluding, police shut down an attempted Rage Against the Machine concert nearby. The two crowds mingled; few avowed anarchists were present, but there was a rebellious atmosphere, as participants had presumably seen footage of the previous day’s events. Police eventually forced the crowd to disperse by attacking with smoke bombs, tear gas grenades, and marker rounds. A similar scene played out the following night after the Rage Against the Machine show in Minneapolis; there was a fair bit of rebellious energy in the crowd, but no organized initiative to get things off the ground, and eventually the police attacked, divided, and dispersed the small march that occurred, arresting 102. Some have speculated as to what might have occurred at these events had anarchists been present with a plan; many anarchists were in jail or busy doing arrestee support, but others did not show up because they had been so focused on September 1 as to be totally unprepared for the rest of the week.*

On the final day of the RNC, there was a march organized by the Anti-War Committee, a group open to civil disobedience tactics. Police

* While organizers in Denver risked spreading themselves too thin between different events, in St. Paul it could have been advantageous to plan more past September 1; on the other hand, there may simply not have been enough time and resources for this.
blockaded all the bridges downtown with snowplows. A reporter who had called anarchists “hooflungs” three days earlier said “This city has never felt more like a police state.” After police canceled the march permit, over a thousand protesters spent several hours attempting to make their way out of downtown. Once again, there were few avowed anarchists present, but the crowd was not exactly docile. As night fell, police began tear-gassing and pepper-spraying indiscriminately, eventually forcing approximately 350 people—including reporters and civilians—onto Marion Street bridge and arresting them all. This flagrantly illegal mass arrest was a public relations disaster for the city.

Did the Strategy Work?

The blockades failed to prevent delegates from reaching the convention. This may have been in part because of the last minute change in plans on the part of the RNC: it must have been easier to get half as many people into the convention center as originally planned. The small turnout from outside the anarchist camp was also a contributing factor: had thousands more protesters showed up, many would surely have reinforced the blockades.

Ineffective as they were at their stated purpose, the blockades created an unpredictable situation, stretching and distracting the police. By forcing the authorities to focus on protecting access to the RNC rather than controlling protesters, the blockading strategy opened space for other tactics which might otherwise have been impossible. Had there simply been a call for confrontational marches, the police might have been able to surround and neutralize them, as in Denver on August 25. This illustrates the strategic difference between what one calls for and what one actually hopes to do.

The strategy also offered a point of entry for everyone who wished to participate in direct action. It gave anarchists something to plan around, which helped them feel invested in the mobilization. Without this, it might have been difficult to get people to come to the RNC in organized affinity groups, ready to act.

There is a tension in mass action strategizing between concentrating forces for maximum surprise to dispersing them for maximum surprise, if protesters are too concentrated, they can be trapped, while if they are spread too thin, they cannot support each other. The Seattle WTO blockades took place in a space of a few blocks; the blockades at the 2007 G8 in Germany were spread out over many miles.

Though some protesters did spend hours wandering St. Paul looking for the action, by and large the blockading strategy resulted in an optimal distribution of forces.

Behind Enemy Lines

The police strategies at the 2004 RNC in New York and at the 2008 RNC in St. Paul were both typical of those police departments. The NYPD is one of the world’s largest standing armies. It is accustomed to crowd control, and was still benefiting from post-9/11 patriotism in 2004—hence it was easy to line the streets with thousands of police and make targeted arrests rather than depending on chemical weapons. St. Paul, on the other hand, is a smaller city unused to large events. The liberal public was not excited about the RNC occurring there, so the government hurried to reassure them that there would be no riots, oppressive policing, or traffic disruptions, promising a surge in shopping and emphasizing the $50 million security budget provided by the Republican National Committee.

The Republican National Committee also bet on the innovation of offering $10 million to cover any lawsuits from police misconduct—acknowledging that, even with the repressive laws on the books, the desired level of repression would demand massive illegal activity from the forces of law and order. Thus, while the city was concerned about PR, the police had a free hand to break their own laws to the tune of $10 million.

In the months leading up to the RNC, an conflict played out between Ramsey County Sheriff Bob Fletcher, on whose shoulders rested the actual dirty work, and the St. Paul Police Department, which was struggling to maintain its image. While the SPPD had promised a “St. Paul model” in contrast to the notoriously brutal “Miami model” from the 2003 FTAA ministerial,
The Republican National Committee hit on the innovation of offering $10 million to cover any lawsuits from police misconduct—acknowledging that, even with the repressive laws on the books, the desired level of repression would demand massive illegal activity from the forces of law and order.

Fletcher let it be known that the police would be out to crack heads, predicting correctly that the authorities wouldn’t have responded with such intense repression if we hadn’t done things the way the police wanted.

Losing Our Innocence

Whatever victories occurred in St. Paul came at a great price, however. The few felony charges stemming from the RNC in 2000 had been a major shock to anarchists; in contrast, 159 people were arrested for supposed felonies during the 2008 RNC. Though most of those charges were dropped or lowered, as of this writing, 16 face pending felonies, several more have pled, and new charges are still being filed. Between 2000 and 2008, anti-anarchist repression had escalated dramatically, as FBI witch hunts sent environmental activists and animal liberationists to prison for up to decades. No convictions from mass mobilizations had resulted in multiple-year prison sentences in the US since the 1990s, but Matthew DePalma, an inexperienced youth entrapped into making Molotov cocktails by informant Andrew Darst, currently awaits sentencing, facing up to ten years. Bradley Crowder is in a similar situation, facing up to four years, and several other RNC defendants may do time as well.

The RNC 8 case is one of the first instances in recent memory in which public organizers are being charged with terrorism simply for coordinating the logistics of a mass mobilization. In this regard, it echoes the SHAC 7 case detailed in Rolling Thunder #6. It’s interesting how the concept of terrorism has evolved over the past decade; after the September 11 attacks rocketed it into prominence, the meaning of the term seems to be broadening at an unstoppable pace. On one hand, this means things are going to get tougher for anarchists and other radicals, on the other hand, when every working family includes a young rebel being charged as a terrorist, the so-called “war on terror” will no longer be the distraction from the class war it was intended to be, but will simply be that war, and people will choose sides accordingly.

If the authorities create a new generation of activists inured to the threat of prison time and the accusation of terrorism, they may regret it. On the other hand, the anarchist movement in the US is small and has very limited resources; there are only so many expensive and exhausting trials it can afford. Only time—and the outcomes of the pending cases—will tell if the repression resulting from the RNC mobilization is sustainable.

Some have pointed to this repression and the case of the RNC 8 in particular as evidence that the term could only expand. At first, terrorism was restricted to mass violence—a major black eye for the government after all its assurances. Riot police fired tear gas, pepper spray, flash-bangs, smoke grenades, and projectiles made of plastic and foam,” yet St. Paul Police Federation President Dave Titus insisted that “a minimal amount of force was used.”

As is customary, anarchists cheerfully called police the advantages in St. Paul, taking on mounted riot cops empty-handed.

In the same Pioneer Press article, police reported that they utilized “tear gas, pepper spray, flash-bangs, smoke grenades, and projectiles made of plastic and foam,” yet St. Paul Police Federation President Dave Titus insisted that “a minimal amount of force was used.”
it is foolish to organize resistance publicly. This alarmist and misguided; the authorities would like nothing better than for anarchists to draw this conclusion and retreat into the shadows, losing track of one another and forfeiting the ability to coordinate their own large scale initiatives. It’s important not to be careless, but effective organizing against the government will always result in repression, whether or not one chooses public roles. In this regard, it’s noteworthy that one of the RNC’s was not involved in the Welcoming Committee, but is being accused as an organizer nonetheless. The more public our efforts are, the more we can build momentum and support, and the better equipped we will be to handle repression.

Learning from Infiltration

Debates about public organizing aside, the WC’s approach made it easy to infiltrate. Some infiltrators were more competent than others; nevertheless, their appearance and behavior differentiated them from others in the community, raising suspicions. They seemed uninterested in radical politics and visibly uncomfortable with the ideology of some anarchists, and displayed classic informant behavior such as asking inappropriate questions while accusing others of being agents. It is important not to decide who is trustworthy solely on appearances, but it’s noteworthy that the infiltrators turned out to be the ones who looked like cops. The WC had identified most of the infiltrators in its midst long before they were outed, but did not expel them for fear of defaming innocent people. Good intentions are admirable, but we must also be able to protect ourselves—the WC might have saved themselves a lot of grief by doing so.

The paranoia that often passed as security culture in convention organizing offered limited protection. Vouching systems failed to keep out protectors who are new to us, and trusting one’s intuition. By September 3, one could hear all the discussion points from 1999 beginning all over again. Is property destruction violence or is it justified by the need to outflank the police? What tactics can build an effective movement for liberation? To some extent, it’s good news when we have to start from scratch again about these issues—it means new people are involved in the discussion. Too much agreement on these questions is a sign of stagnation and insularity. At the same time, intra-movement bickering provides the authorities valuable opportunities, so it is potentially historic that the St. Paul police have been using these propaganda techniques since the Seattle WTO protests, and they learned to script a strategy beforehand lest the media accidentally focus on real issues. Unfortunately, the WC’s approach to the media was played into the hands of the police. The police have been using these propaganda techniques to smear anarchists as violent, waste-throwing invaders. This was essential to prepare the grounds for repression; police have been using these propaganda techniques since the Seattle WTO protests, and they learned to script a strategy beforehand lest the media accidentally focus on real issues. Too much agreement on these questions is a sign of stagnation and insularity. At the same time, intra-movement bickering provides the authorities valuable opportunities, so it is potentially historic that the St. Paul police have been using these propaganda techniques since the Seattle WTO protests, and they learned to script a strategy beforehand lest the media accidentally focus on real issues. Diversity of Tactics

By September 3, one could hear all the discussions from 1999 beginning all over again. Is property destruction violence or is it justified by the need to outflank the police? What tactics can build an effective movement for liberation? To some extent, it’s good news when we have to start from scratch again about these issues—it means new people are involved in the discussion. “Diversity of Tactics” by Katrina Pilz, member of the Anti-War Committee and the Coalition to March on the RNC and Stop the War

Principles served to prevent it. It remains to be seen whether this agreement was a precedent for future mobilizations or simply an anomaly produced by a dwindling antirwar movement. Would other protest groups have sought mutual respect with anarchists if there had been more influential allies available? At the Seattle WTO protests, militant anarchists were a minority who exerted influence by acting outside the central organizing framework. In St. Paul, they were intimately involved in coordinating that central framework. Does this indicate that anarchism is shifting from the margins to become a significant force in political organizing? Or will the intensity of government repression in St. Paul discourage organizers from participating in future mobilizations or simply align them against the corporate media? For that matter, did anarchists simply inherit the antirwar movement after everyone else had abandoned it?

Party Like It’s 1999

After the MTV success of Nirvana and the explosion of “grunge” music, record labels sought to cash in on the antiwar movement after everyone else had abandoned it.

The very use of the word ‘violence’ to describe the actions of protesters in the face of the police state we witnessed is ridiculous. Pepper spraying a girl repeatedly in the face after she attempted to hand a flower to a police officer is violence. A broken window is more e√ective than in a million Iraqis killed, or entire cities destroyed by the U.S. occupation forces? A whole lot of windows get broken when the U.S. drops bombs. Which is the bigger concern?”

Katrina Pilz, member of the Anti-War Committee and the Coalition to March on the RNC and Stop the War

When anarchists famously smashed windows at the Seattle WTO protests in 1999, there were ten times as many people on the streets, and ten as many police. Whether or not it was a worthwhile use of energy, it is impressive that it happened at all in St. Paul.

It remains to be seen how the precedents set at the RNC, during a comparatively quiet phase of social struggle, will influence events next time resistance becomes widespread.

pursuit throughout the past decade. The Seattle WTO protests have become a common point of reference for both protesters and police. For the former, they are a sort of creation myth, a messianic omen that belief will come again; but you can never repeat the past, even if it inspires you to make new history.

Let’s compare the RNC protests in St. Paul with the WTO protests, then, since it is practically impossible not to. A great deal of the organizing for Seattle was funded by NGOs, while the DNC and RNC mobilizations came entirely out of grassroots initiatives. There were only a few hundred utterly unprepared police in Seattle, while over the past decade events such as the DNC have come to be defended by literally military occupations; in that light, it is a miracle any direct action occurred in St. Paul. Paul at all. Some New York anarchists who had participated in the 2004 RNC reported that they had a much more fulfilling experience in St. Paul. If it were possible to compose an equation charting dollars spent on security and policing against numbers of protesters, minutes of airtime, and degrees of disruption, we might find that the 2008 RNC scored fairly well compared to the WTO protests. Yet such an equation would tell us nothing about how effective the RNC mobilization was at actually bringing us closer to liberation. The critical difference between Seattle and St. Paul was that the WTO protests brought tens of thousands of people, including but not limited to anarchists, together in an unfamiliar and inspiring situation. The RNC mobilization was a much more limited affair. However successful our mobilizations are in themselves, they are useless if they do not ultimately enable us to generalize the struggle against hierarchy.

Critical Assessment

Viewed as a means of breaking a few windows or obtaining television airtime, any multi-year organizing effort is extremely inefficient. But the year and a half of preparation was valuable in itself as a means of building networks, visibility, and experience; the same goes for the legal support phase afterwards. Regardless of whether the RNC was successfully blockaded, the real significance of the mobilization lies in the way it raised the bar for what it means to organize as anarchists. If those who cut their teeth preparing for the convention continue to mobilize nationwide networks, organized into autonomous affinity groups within a larger strategic framework, it will have been worth the trouble. Often it is the events like the RNC, or for that matter the protests against the EU summit in Greece in 2003, that lay the groundwork for anarchist participation in more spontaneous and far-reaching uprisings such as the recent ones in Oakland and Greece.

So intensive organizing is valuable in itself—but was the RNC the most sensible target? Probably not. As described, when it was first chosen, anarchists expected it to attract tens of thousands of protesters from others geographies. Once upon a time, the Republicans seemed invincible—but by the time we finally built up the courage to take them on, they were so weakened that we could not build a long term, organic strategy upon opposing them.* Between the backlash against Bush, the hurricane, and the revelation that Palins unwed teenage daught- er was pregnant, the RNC would have been a disaster even without anarchist resistance. Obama’s election signals a definitive end to the context that generated the RNC protests from the Now that the Bush years are over, anarchists should congratulate ourselves on having survived a difficult era with at least some vestiges of continuity and collective memory intact. The Obama era will doubtless pose its own challenges; we will have to find new ways to mobilize and reach out to potential comrades. We must lay down a root system that can sustain us well into the 21st century, so we can build on experiences such as the DNC and RNC mobilizations.

Backlash

As mentioned above, a few self-described anarchists had been horrified that others were mobilizing militant resistance to both political parties rather than trying to emulate the Obama campaign.

* See David Graeber’s “The Shock of Victory” in Rolling Thunder #5.

In November 2008, while many who had participated in the DNC and RNC mobilizations were busy coordinating legal support, these individuals resurfaced with a tortuous call to attend Obama’s inauguration in a spirit of “presence rather than protest.” The idea was to “gather as a bloc, unmasked and with open arms, respecting the celebratory spirit of the day” and “illustrate the many moments when people on this continent and across the world aspired to better approximations of freedom.” Perhaps because there was nothing else scheduled for the inauguration, a few respected organizing groups and a fair number of individuals signed on to the call, but its apparent rejection of militant opposition provoked vicious controversy. In the end, despite other calls, no other mobilizations came together for the inauguration, and scant few people participated in the “Celebrate People’s History & Build Popular Power” bloc. It’s hard not to interpret this call as an opportunistic attempt to counteract whatever momentum towards militant organizing had come out of the convention protests. The originators of the call feared that if anarchists took a stand against Obama it would lose “relevance,” but the outcome showed that however limited the social base for confrontational direct action might be, the social base for a more conciliatory anarchism was practically nonexistent. In this emerging era of reformism and co-optation, resistance will be militant or else will not be at all. In the buildup to the DNC and RNC protests, anarchists had emphasized opposition to all politicians and parties, including Obama. The absence of any visible protest at the inauguration, despite the precedent of the two previous inaugurations and the desire to maintain momentum from the conventions, indicates that the militant wing of the anarchist movement had exhausted itself. Perhaps if organizers had included plans to protest at the inauguration in the mobilization against the conventions, emphasizing that this would occupy the gap between the events, things might have played out differently. There are risks to picking targets far in advance, but also to not doing so.

This anecdote illustrates how militant victories, however modest, can provoke internal as well as external backlash. It also shows how reformist victories can divide and disable anarchist organizing. Although the inauguration may not have been the most strategic opportunity to manifest opposition, it is important not to forget how many other people have a stake in resisting the oppression they experience daily. Remember the diverse crowd that gathered in outrage in Denver, when the police mass-arrested the black bloc on August 25. Even with Obama on the ballot or in the White House, when the lines are drawn, people know where they stand in relation to authority.
We Are All Legal Workers
Legal Support at the RNC and After

Ever since the Seattle WTO protests, legal collectives have sought to counteract state repression by supporting participants in direct action. Even outside mass mobilizations, such collectives can serve a valuable role wherever people face police harassment or arrest. Unfortunately, it’s notoriously hard to recruit people for legal support; it isn’t portrayed as sexy, it takes a lot of work, and many people wrongly fear that it requires special training.

The RNC legal effort started with a small group of determined people; most had no experience with legal work. Some met at the poorly attended legal breakout session at the first pRe-NC, where they agreed that there was a need for more legal resources in the radical community and discussed organizing legal support structures for the RNC and beyond. The challenge of doing legal support for such a large mobilization was daunting, even the group’s most experienced legal workers had never attempted anything near that scale. Ultimately, they pulled it off, with a lot of help from others who had done that work before. In January 2008, they formed Coldsnap Legal Collective with the intention of setting up a jail support hotline, composing materials and trainings, and preparing legal support infrastructures for the convention. After speaking with legal workers from around the country, they also decided to organize a jail vigil and street team.

We’re Ready—Are We?

Months before the RNC, Coldsnap began offering trainings locally and regionally, teaching people solidarity tactics, their legal rights, and how to interact with police. These evolved from dry lectures to participatory role-plays drawing on materials* from more established legal collectives.

Coldsnap called the first national RNC legal support meeting to coincide with the second pRe-NC. The more experienced national legal workers wanted Coldsnap to provide direction for the effort; to help, they offered support resources, and access to pre-existing networks. They put on “trainers’ trainings,” established a database,† and arrived weeks in advance to help set up the office and other structures.

One of the purposes of legal collectives is to bridge the gap between activists and the legal community, between whom there is often mutual distrust. Coldsnap’s attempt to navigate these relationships produced mixed results. The lawyers made dire predictions about what would happen at the RNC, which were poorly received by many radicals. Lawyers regarded Coldsnap with suspicion, on account of their unprofessional appearance and lack of law license; though the lawyers, legal workers, and activists all needed each other to be effective, communication was a struggle.

Originally, Coldsnap intended to create a decentralized model of legal support, encouraging every affinity group to have its own legal support structure in place. They hoped that doing so would dismantle the perceived hierarchy of knowledge connected to legal work. This did not occur; most affinity groups did not make viable support plans for themselves, and Coldsnap ultimately did legal support for almost everyone.

The Storm Hits

Utilizing a web service that forwarded a single number to multiple phones, Coldsnap set up a 24-hour hotline in the spring, providing jail support for local events and encouraging everyone to memorize the number or write it on their bodies. For the convention, they set up shop in an office of NLG lawyers. The office included six phone lines connected to the hotline number and multiple computers sharing the central database. The hope was that occupying a legal office would protect against raids and subpoenas, due to attorney-client privilege issues.

The jail support hotline was connected to the office on August 29, hours before the convergence space was raided, from then on, people staffed the space 24 hours a day. Legal workers were busy that whole weekend dealing with house raids, detentions, and arrests, as well as preparing for the convention. Coldsnap sent representatives to the weekend spokes councils, and helped form a jail solidarity plan in which arrestees would give the name Jesse Sparkles rather than their real names and refuse to be separated on account of gender or severity of charge.

On September 1, the office was at maximum capacity. There were volunteers answering the phones and entering data, two information coordinators, one person handling media, and one person sending out reports via Twitter. Lawyers were constantly in conferences in the other room. The hotline received thousands of calls; information on police actions and arrests was verified and publicized, and arrestees spoke to caring people who listened to their stories, took down their information, and gave their loved ones updates and reassurance.

A non-stop vigil outside the jail provided arrestees clean clothes, food, and hugs upon release. Legal workers were alerted of unfolding events and dispatched to the streets from a separate location; between missions, they dropped off reports at the office. The atmosphere was intense—no one had slept, everything was happening at once, and not all the news was good. At times, tempers ran high. At one point on September 1, the lawyers became particularly irritated when an anarchist posted “black bloc make total destroy everywhere!” over the Twitter system, fearing it might pose problems for future legal efforts. Things did not improve from there. On the third day of the convention, a day still known to many legal workers as “Black Wednesday,” several things happened at once. The affidavits in the RNC 8 case were released to the press, with a number of Coldsnap members listed as members of the Welcoming Committee. Police came to the building housing the legal office, claiming to be responding to a hostage situation involving the videographers upstairs; then the landlord showed up, demanding an explanation and threatening eviction. The lawyers responded by banning everyone involved with the RNC from the office and barring them from participating in RNC legal work. The blacklisted people, however, were the Coldsnap collective members responsible for bottomlining the office, which left out-of-town legal workers with all the responsibility and confused arrestees calling a place where no one had any context for them.

By the end of the week, the police had arrested 818 protestors, downtown St. Paul had become a full-on police state, and almost everyone was exhausted, in jail, or both. Not everything had gone as planned. The street team was a literal bust, as members were immediately singled out and targeted for arrest. The jail solidarity plan did not get the desired results; the police brutalized arrestees rather than meeting their demands, and the separated and demoralized Sparkles eventually gave their real names. In the office, processing the massive quantities of information that came in proved significantly more difficult than anticipated; volunteers struggled with the data entry backlog for months afterward. And although the banned Coldsnap members were eventually allowed to participate again, relations between legal workers and lawyers remained strained for some time.

Aftermath

The first meeting of RNC arrestees and supporters two days after the end of the convention evolved into CRASS (Community RNC Arrestee Support Structure), a spokescouncil of working groups dedicated to helping arrestees through the court process. CRASS provided a travel fund for arrestees, helped them file civil suits, and called protests and press conferences to put pressure on city officials. Coldsnap got a new office and continued to staff the hotline and conduct trainings, but mostly they worked with CRASS, having organized themselves out of a job.

CRASS came up with strategies for court solidarity that have worked with felons; in addition to keeping the potential consequences of our actions in mind and mentally preparing ourselves for worst-case scenarios, we must plan and be equipped for legal action. Whether or not we organize or participate in mass mobilizations, anarchists will continue to be charged with felonies. The RNC 8 started out with one felony charge and are facing four as of this writing; another arrestee started out with two felony charges before the prosecutor increased the number to six and threatened to add six more. We have yet to see the results of these efforts, but it is clear that this fight is far from over.

Mutual aid and solidarity strengthen our communities and discourage repression. Police tactics are intended to maintain isolation, silence, and fear. When people are familiar with the legal system and confident that they will be supported, they are less likely to be cowed by threats or fall for trickery. Many participants in the RNC protests expressed that the legal support available to them helped them feel more empowered to take action.

We can no longer afford to leave legal work to the experts. In light of the repressive response to the RNC protests, this is more important than ever. Whether or not we organize or participate in mass mobilizations, anarchists will continue to be charged with felonies. In addition to keeping the potential consequences of our actions in mind and mentally preparing ourselves for worst-case scenarios, we must plan and be equipped for legal support. In an age when anarchists are organized by the police and criminalizing our actions in mind and mentally preparing ourselves for worst-case scenarios, we must plan and be equipped for legal support. In an age when anarchists organizing attracts federal attention and multi-million-dollar security budgets, all of us are at risk. The safety and security of our communities depend on our ability to respond and support each other.

Like it or not—these days, we are all legal workers.

How to Dance on the Grave of Capitalism

A Brief Explanation of the Crisis, and a Foray into Possible Sites of Intervention
Capitalism without failure is like religion without sin—it just doesn't work. Far from abnormal, the boom/bust cycle is as predictable as the furious scapegoating and wild-eyed cheerleading that accompany it. But every situation, even the most predictable, creates unique opportunities.

So how exactly did some of the world's most powerful economies land in this deep recession? That's a deceptively difficult question. The global financial system operates on a variety of levels of transparency, making it impossible to be certain who has what and how much it is worth. The system also relies on a high level of interconnectedness between different institutions and industries, making it difficult to predict when and where the dominoes will stop falling in a recession. That took place in the mid-1990s, due in large part to the lobbying of commercial banks, the US government began deregulating the banking industry, repealing laws that had governed it following the Great Depression. Simultaneously, it created institutional and consumer incentives for home buying, motivated in part by statistical evidence that home ownership was the single greatest determinant of a family's financial success. At the same time, the dot-com boom was putting money into consumers' and bankers' pockets, although that bubble burst in 2001; it was quickly replaced by a new bubble in real estate.

This began a massive surge in home buying. Part of the increase in buying was made possible by "sub-prime mortgages": loans with adjustable interest rates, given to people who were spending money they had no way of paying altogether. As of this writing, at least two million of the seven million sub-prime mortgages used to buy homes since 1998 are expected to default and one in ten mortgages are in some stage of "delinquency.

What led to the failures of Lehman Brothers, AIG, Morgan Stanley, Fannie Mac, and Freddie Mac, the news of which had cable news anchors on the verge of tears? To put it in very general terms, the trading of sub-prime mortgage-backed securities turned out to be a market that was almost completely unregulated and pushed to wildly unrealistic heights by the terms of credit and investment since the 1980s.

The US economy has been in decline for over a year now. The economic crisis that made headlines in September 2008 was not the beginning of the recession, but rather a stage in an ongoing economic malaise. By the year's end, unemployment had hit a 34-year high. Whether this becomes a depression or merely a harsh recession, anarchists in the US will undoubtedly see levels of poverty and class anger unraveled in the recent past. Economic forecasts are difficult to make. Nonetheless, we can study the effects this crisis is already having on ordinary people, along with some current organizing efforts and actions, and begin formulating an anarchist strategy for recovering the original economic turmoil. Currently, the two most immediate effects of the economic crisis are in housing and unemployment. This time around, unlike in the early 1970s, layoffs at businesses that can no longer get loans from banks will supplement the closing of factories that began after the neoliberal economic reforms of the late 1990s. Foreclosures and evictions are increasing throughout the country as well.

The Chicago Occupation

On November 7, all 240 employees of Republic Windows and Doors in Chicago voted to form an occupation of their factory to protest the company's refusal to pay them the 60-day severance pay to which they were legally entitled. The company's stance was a direct result of Bank of America's unwillingness to grant them a loan despite $32 billion in federal money only weeks earlier. This action was proposed from within the union and approved through official union channels. UE, one of the more rank-and-file and independent unions in the US, acted as an intermediary between the workers and the company. Perhaps because the works had a legal claim, politicians throughout Illinois right up to Obama expressed support for the factory's occupiers. An IWW support committee also formed in Chicago, and solidarity pickets occurred at Bank of America branches across the country. By day six of the occupation, Bank of America had agreed to grant Republic a new loan, and a deal had been reached for workers to be paid.

In some senses, this action signals the return of the workplace sit-in, a direct action tactic first used by the Wobblies in 1906 but not seen in the US for many decades. Despite mediation by UE in this case, this tactic has historically been a crucial first step in workers developing their own decision-making bodies independent of union bureaucracies. The solidarity pickets outside the factory and the presence of anarchists in Chicago and around the country illustrates how even direct action-based struggles can be legitimized and thus defused. Obama's public stance on this issue seems to have made a major difference in how the media presented the occupation, and later how the workers presented themselves. Union mediation and Democratic support of the sit-in kept a potentially inflammatory situation under control. If this support had not materialized, would the workers have endured a harsh winter and media clampdown? Or would the occupation had continued indefinitely due to the closure of the factory itself? Even if the workers had taken over and self-managed the company, would it have made any sense to run a worker-owned windows and doors factory in a failing housing market, during an economic depression? Although institutionalized mediation will be less likely in struggles in which the workers have less legal grounds for their claims, anarchists must watch to see whether Obama's support of the occupation is part of the apparatus of the government. If it is, how can we push direct action struggles above and beyond their institutionalized management?

Take Back the Land

In the face of the foreclosures and evictions of the housing crisis, one solution that immediately comes to mind is squatting. Unlike workplace direct action, which has been an...
Rolling Thunder
Since October 2008, as part of the Community Control Over Housing © campaign, TBL has been scouting abandoned houses in Miami and helping families and individuals move into them. As of this writing, at least six families have moved into houses, while over fifty more are on a waiting list. Beyond advising individuals on available houses, TBL helps residents obtain utilities, food, construction supplies, and free legal representation. The group combines this direct action with a powerful critique of how private land ownership and development has affected the Black community in Miami. While not explicitly anarchist, TBL organizes as a horizontal, anti-hierarchal group; it is harshly critical of elected officials, argues that land in the Black community belongs to that community, and structures initiatives so as to avoid “reproducing the power and social relationships of the broader society in a smaller setting.”

The approach taken by TBL utilizes skills that many US anarchists already have: in the US, social movements and communities where evictions and foreclosures are imminent, a pro bono lawyer willing to be on call, and some basic squatting experience. Additionally, it demands a media strategy that makes sure the issues preserves squatters’ privacy while publicizing the reasons people take such action.

While large numbers of abandoned houses are less available, another approach to the housing crisis could include pressuring banks to stop foreclosures and evictions of families occupying bank-owned houses. This builds on the precedent for anti-eviction tactics and suggests ways to drop mountaintop removal companies, as well as the aforementioned events in Chicago. While some groups have already started picketing bank branches, this is the perfect time to step it up. The campaign against mountaintop removal successfully combined public fieri with consistent night-time vandalism with a broad media strategy. The efficacy of such a campaign depends less on the level of risk participants are willing to take on than the consistency of deportations during a depression can also exacerbate xenophobic tendencies in communities, increasing the importance of Anti-Racist Action and specifically anti-Minutemen groups. It will be important to find ways to show active solidarity with those facing deportation, be they inside or outside of our own communities. Many of the workers facing deportation will also be the most vulnerable to housing instabilities, as they often have even less legal recourse when faced with foreclosures and evictions.

The contraction of the economy and the change in presidential administration both provide powerful propaganda opportunities. In contrast to earlier periods of ineffectual protest and a dystopian vision of the future, we can link a systemic critique of capitalism to the immediate, tangible alternative of mutual aid. Especially when it is a component of direct action, accessible anti-capitalist propaganda will play better in the coming years.

The current heightening of expectations in the political sphere can serve as an opportunity to make large-scale urban insurrection. It will be important to find ways to show active solidarity with the workers and communities where evictions and foreclosures are imminent, a pro bono lawyer willing to be on call, and some basic squatting experience. Additionally, it demands a media strategy that preserves squatters’ privacy while publicizing the reasons people take such action.

Conclusions/Horizons

As government social services are likely to diminish even further and non-profits will surely suffer a decline in donations, this is the perfect time for anarchists to make an attempt to expand their outreach to the local community and take the offensive. Free food providers could capitalize on increased demand by pressuring space from which to conduct their programs, or mobilize public support in order to squat spaces themselves. This is a time when such groups should use their position to organize an anti-capitalist stance, not shrink from their politics.

The rise in job losses and the likelihood of intensifying anti-capitalist seeds. We can accomplish this by consistently, concretely, and unapologetically applying basic anti-capitalist and anti-authoritarian principles to everyday problems.
Oakland, January 7, 2009

A dumpster is burning in the intersection of 17th and Webster in downtown Oakland. To my left a teenager is kicking through the window of a closed shop, to my right glass showers a young girl holding a two-by-four. Up ahead there are people jumping on the windshields of every car on the street to the beat of Bay Area Hyphy music, leaping from one to the other like some rebellious version of Mario Brothers in a dark urban landscape.

Suddenly, someone scurries up next to me:

“You can, I can holla at you?”

I turn and look at the kid in disbelief and annoyance, “Man, you can’t holla at someone during a riot!”

“Why not? It’s chill!” And he spreads his arms. The cops were sweeping up the streets that night, almost at a march, to the whistle of a chopper overhead. He’s got a point, I think. This may be a riot, but somehow there is also time to holla.

It all started at a rally on January 7 at the Fruitvale BART station, where Oscar Grant was murdered. At 3 a.m., a diverse crowd began gathering around a sound system at the station entrance. As the mic was passed between speakers it was immediately evident that there was a split in the sentiments of the crowd over what action should be taken—or rather, what action had to be taken. Rally organizers who urged people to be peaceful were met by a damning response. In contrast, there was heavy applause from the crowd as the Black Panther Party—which originated in Oakland—and Malcolm X were referenced over and over again. One speaker put it bluntly: “I’m feeling pretty violent right now, I’m on some Malcolm X shit: by any means necessary. I don’t see any action, I’m gonna cause a ruckus myself.”

An old march of about 300 mostly young people split from the rally and headed down International Boulevard. Police cruisers cautiously kept their distance but were met by angry screams from the marchers as floodlights from a helicopter splashed over people chanting and carrying banners. As the sun began to set and shadows stretched across the avenue, heralding the quickly approaching night, there was an urgency in the crowd like electricity in the air when a storm is gathering. As the march pushed on, closer and closer to downtown Oakland, a panicked rally organizer, feeling the tension and asking over a bullhorn for the crowd to be peaceful, wanted to lead the march back to the Fruitvale BART station.

“Fuck that,” said one youth in the front. “We know where we’re going. We’re going to BART police headquarters.”

8th and Madison. BART police headquarters, a police cruiser is in the intersection. As we crossed the highway and a parking lot into downtown, people had taken advantage of the temporary absence of police to scavenge the urban landscape. A dumpster rolled quickly down the street as marchers began to jog.

The crowd approached the cruiser and surrounded it, shouting, “Pigs go home!” The cops exited their vehicle and hastily retreated. The cruiser was quickly destroyed, setting off hours of what became a full-on riot. People jumped up and down on the cruiser with smiles across their faces, shouting and laughing. It was the first of many moments that night when we felt the injuries of the world temporarily reconciled by the power rising from the streets.

The dumpster was lit on fire and passed through the hands of people of all colors before being rammed into the cruiser. As 15 people began to rock the vehicle in an attempt to overturn it, riot police arrived and shot tear gas and rubber bullets to disperse the crowd.

We ran through Chinatown towards Broadway, the main street in downtown Oakland, pulling things into the street to prevent the police from following. Two hundred of us were on Broadway approaching Oakland Police Headquarters when the police charged, scattering people on foot and bikes through the streets of downtown.

A group of young Latinos were standing in front of the police line, refusing to be moved off the street. A white person in his thirties was being dragged away behind police lines. These were “everyday” people, indignant, refusing to back down.

Solidarity between strangers and defiance to authority were felt most strongly during unarrests. Throughout the night, all sorts of people pulled arrestees back from the police unflinchingly and without a second thought.

But the crowd would not be dispersed.

I arrived at 14th and Franklin an hour later, just as police were backing up the crowd that had gathered a block up on Broadway. As I took in the diversity of the people gathered in the intersection, the potential of what was unfolding in the streets sank in. An older Black woman was screaming at the police. Rolling Thunder on the streets of Oakland on January 7 was white.

That was when I ran into the Mayor. Practically limping from the blows to my right leg, I continued up 14th without a plan. When I first saw Mayor Dellums, there were only about 20 people following him as he strode up 14th street, walking over broken glass and past burned vehicles. Many people were yelling at him, and as he walked, he gathered more and more of a crowd. At some point riot squad police began quietly pacing behind the crowd; some of us turned and began yelling at them, while others yelled at the Mayor to call off the police, which he did, for the moment.

When we saw the armored vehicle again, two blocks behind us, we all split up. I headed towards 14th street. The adrenaline from the police beating I had received earlier was beginning to wear off and I winced with pain when I remembered more and more of a crowd. At some point riot squad police began quietly pacing behind the crowd; some of us turned and began yelling at them, while others yelled at the Mayor to call off the police, which he did, for the moment. The realization coming over his face: “What, blood!” Mayor Dellums said. “We got this shit tonight. We don’t need the police.”

That night the town stood up. After most of the businesses and cars on 17th Street had been destroyed and many dopants had been set on fire, the crowd split up. The random group of strangers I was with passed a forklift. “Give me a screwdriver,” I said, pointing to it. “If we take that thing, we can do anything.” Everyone laughed and we turned a corner.

Riot squad police began quietly pacing behind the crowd; some of us turned and began yelling at them, while others yelled at the Mayor to call off the police, which he did, for the moment.

By the time we reached City Hall over a hundred people had regrouped. The Mayor stood on the steps of City Hall and attempted to give a speech. He said that Oscar Grant’s murder would be treated as a homicide; he apologized for the slow pace of the investigation, and asked the crowd to be peaceful. His words were met with boos and screams. “Your police beats Black people everyday!” a woman standing on a ledge on City Hall Plaza yelled. Either in frustration or for want of anything else to say, Dellums went inside City Hall with his entourage. There are some moments that stay with you; upon thinking back to them you smile to yourself. A North African man came up to me and chatted about riots in his country, then haggled me and gave me a kiss on the cheek.

They were risking more days or months off their lives that they might spend in jail or prison, or probation, more time lost in the traps of a racist system. They risked beatings from those whose brutality is concentrated on young black and brown skin. Later that night in the holding cell, some of those arrested had moments of serious regret as they speculated about the possible charges they might face. A seasoned Black organizer who had also been rounded up addressed the group: “In ten years, nah fuck it, in six months you ain’t gonna remember sitting in here right now—all you’ll remember is the night the town stood up.”

Somehow, the events that night did not feel like a single-issue initiative. It wasn’t just about Oscar Grant or police brutality. It was the streets of Oakland screaming its daily struggle—war with the police, the city, and the state—in which the pendulum that swings between imprisonment and everyday economic struggle is part of the life cycle. The ones who rose up put a lot on the line; many had previous charges, warrants, and trauma from their daily dealings with the state. They were risking more days or months off their lives that they might spend in jail or prison, or probation, more time lost in the traps of a racist system. For some unknown reason, it seemed almost every cop on the streets of Oakland on January 7 was white.

I am a society in which property is valued over human life, it is necessary to destroy a great deal of it before many people even take notice of an outrage such as the murder of Oscar Grant.

For all the blame that the media and organizers put on different participants for the riots, it was the Mayor of Oakland who managed to consolidate an otherwise fully dispersed crowd; indeed, the second wave of rioting was ignited directly after the Mayor spoke on the steps of City Hall.

The Riots in Greece and the Insurrections to Come

Following the police killing of 15-year-old Alexandros Grigoropoulos in downtown Athens, Greece was wracked by weeks of unprecedented rioting. Anarchists and students, supported and often joined by significant swaths of the population, clashed with police, destroyed corporate and government property, and occupied government buildings, trade union offices, and media outlets, not to mention universities.

There is a lot to learn from the uprising in Greece, most of which is not immediately apparent from photographs.

TIMELINE

December 6: Police shoot and kill Alexandros Grigoropoulos, a 15-year-old student, during a minor confrontation in the Athens neighborhood Exarchia. Exarchia is the center of Athens’ anarchist community and a frequent site of clashes with police. Within hours, 10,000 people fill the streets of Exarchia, including many anarchists, and begin burning banks, stores, and cars and erecting flaming barricades while fighting riot police; 24 officers are injured the first night. A police station near the Acropolis is attacked and severely damaged. Ermou Street, a strip of posh boutiques, is attacked by enraged crowds, including some from local bars and clubs, who smash windows and loot goods. Anarchists occupy the campus of Athens Polytechnic as a base for organizing; Greek police are barred by law from entering universities, making them frequent sites of occupation by anti-authoritarians. The nearby Schools of Law and Economics are quickly occupied as well. Riots also erupt in the northern city of Thessaloniki, where anarchists attack City Hall, two police precincts, several shops, and a bank, as well as Greek television channel vehicles.

December 7: In an attempt to calm the rioting, the police officers responsible for the shooting are arrested and condemned by Greek politicians. That afternoon, tens of thousands of people pour into the streets all around the country. In Athens, three banks, a supermarket, and dozens of shops are attacked with Molotov cocktails and destroyed, while dozens of other symbols of capitalism—including 17 banks, a favorite target of Greek anarchists—are damaged during an afternoon march intended to reach police headquarters. Police respond with rubber bullets and tear gas, splintering the marchers, who continue targeting corporate businesses as they retreat. Riots also erupt in the western city of Patras, where a police officer is beaten by students. On the tourist islands of Crete and Corfu, three banks are damaged by Molotovs, as is a city hall, and spontaneous marches fill the streets. Everywhere, police attempt to control the crowds with massive volleys of tear gas.

December 8: In Athens, hundreds of high-school students gather in front of police headquarters to protest the killing. The students march towards the city center, with one group attacking a police station and overturning police cars. A demonstration is called by the Law School occupation for the early evening in the city’s center. About 20,000 people gather and some of the most severe rioting of the entire month begins almost immediately. Dozens of shops, banks, and luxury hotels have their windows smashed and are subsequently burned as youths fight running battles with riot police. Rioters torch the massive Christmas tree in central Syntagma Square. In Thessaloniki, hundreds of masked youths hurl rocks and Molotov cocktails at storefronts and riot police, who respond with tear gas. In Athens, rioters surround a fire truck as it tries to extinguish a blaze, smashing the truck’s windows and setting it alight. Elsewhere, rioters loot a store selling hunting weapons and swords. Burning barricades also light up the night sky in the city of Larissa in central Greece.

December 11: The funeral for Alexandros Grigoropoulos, in a southern Athens suburb, is attended by 6000 people. Police fire tear gas at the crowd when mourners refuse to disperse after the family’s requiem, an afternoon of street fighting ensues. Locals gather in the streets, shouting at police to stop firing gas in the residential area. As midnight approaches, those occupying Athens Polytechnic set the surrounding streets ablaze with firebombs as they target police who again respond with tear gas. In the western part of Patras, 500 youths lay siege to the police headquarters during the evening; approximately 100 of them subsequently make a break for the sanctuary of university buildings, where clashes continue. Anarchists also occupy a local TV station to broadcast their own message.

December 10: A general strike planned by the country’s main business union is suspended at the start of the riots paralyzing the country. Foreign and domestic flights are grounded, banks and schools are shut, and hospitals run on emergency services as hundreds of thousands walk off the job. Clashes break out at Athens’ main court complex, where the two police officers aced in the fatal shooting are testifying. Youthful Molotov cocktails at the courts and police fire tear gas. The protesters also attack and damage a television satellite truck. Members of the Communist party attempt to suppress ongoing riots and occupations in the city of Patras with the tacit approval of the police. The city of Athens is occupied, solidarity actions also take place in Frankfurt, Brussels, Istanbul, and many other cities.

December 11: 35 police stations are blockaded in Athens by high-school students and their parents, students also attack the entrance of a prison. A mix of anarchists and local residents is calling a multiple-language strike for resistance and hold an evening assembly. The number of school occupations around the country increases in spite of the efforts of the communist party’s youth wing to prevent protesters from entering campuses.

December 12: Despite heavy rains, several hundred protesters erect burning barricades in Athens and attack police with rocks and flares. Riot police respond by firing tear gas and chasing the protesters through parts of the city, who chant “murders out” and use laser pointers to attempt to obscure the vision of police.

December 13: Youthful firebomb a police station near Exarchia, where a silent vigil marking one week since the murder was broken up by riot police earlier in the day. Rioters in Athens also smash cash dispensers and shatter dozens of shop windows, cart off mobile telephones, watches, clothes, and computers. Dozens of youths attack a police station in central Athens, at least three banks, several stores, and a government building with Molotov cocktails and broken paving stones.

December 14: During the day, four major radio stations are occupied by protesters who broadcast their views, read communiqués, and call for more people to participate in the protests; additionally, two radio stations in Athens and one in Thessaloniki operate from within the occupied universities. Police, in Athens, also smash cash dispensers and shatter dozens of shop windows, cart off mobile telephones, watches, clothes, and computers. Dozens of youths attack a police station in central Athens, at least three banks, several stores, and a government building with Molotov cocktails and broken paving stones.

December 15: During the day, four major radio stations are occupied by protesters who broadcast their views, read communiqués, and call for more people to participate in the protests; additionally, two radio stations in Athens and one in Thessaloniki operate from within the occupied universities. Police, in Athens, also smash cash dispensers and shatter dozens of shop windows, cart off mobile telephones, watches, clothes, and computers. Dozens of youths attack a police station in central Athens, at least three banks, several stores, and a government building with Molotov cocktails and broken paving stones.

December 16: Protesters hang giant banners from the Acropolis, calling a rally in multiple languages for resistance and demonstrations across Europe. A dozen anarchists on motorcycles set fire to a police bus in central Athens; no one is hurt. In Thessaloniki, a bank and a local government office are firebombed before dawn.

December 17: A group of anarchists storm a supermarket in Thessaloniki, filling shopping carts with food before burning past the checkpoints and distributing the booty to passersby. In Athens, 5000 protesters swamp riot police outside parliament; a breakaway group attempts to breach a cordon guarding the central Syntagma Square complex, and police respond with tear gas. When the initial attack at the parliament is repelled, protesters return with a hail of oranges before setting cars, dumpsters, and furniture from outdoor cafés ablaze as they retreat towards Athens Polytechnic. Meanwhile, the headquarters of the country’s largest labor union—the bureaucratic General Confederation of Greek Workers (GSEE)—is occupied by insurgent workers; an open workers’ assembly is hosted in the building.

December 18: 7000 students and other protesters march through central Athens. A group breaks away from the peaceful march to hurl rocks and firebombs at police and buildings near parliament, overturn a car, and set fire to dumpsters; they also splash police with red paint. Firefighters and police rush to prevent another group of protesters from burning down the city’s main Christmas tree, which was replaced after the first was torched.

December 19: Thousands of youths demonstrate as anger flares following the shooting of another 17-year-old student in the western suburbs of Athens. Students holding a banner reading “Their Terrorism Will Not Work” march through the streets to protest the shooting, which many see as an attempt to intimidate student protesters. Elsewhere in Athens, 20 anarchists attack the French cultural institute, burning its exterior and smashing marble columns and tear down a Greek flag; cathedral officials cancel a scheduled Christmas Eve service after the vandalism. Riot police cordon off the central Syntagma Square to protect the capital’s main Christmas tree. An anarchist group calling itself Nok1045’s offshoot. A group of hoodlums claims responsibility for a blast targeting the offices of a far-right political party earlier that morning; the homemade device, comprising several gas canisters, caused damage but no injuries.

December 20: Six police vehicles are torched by hooded assailants in the western suburbs of Athens in the early morning; the vehicles were parked outside the police accounting department, which is also damaged. Around the same time, clashes with police continue at Athens Polytechnic, with protesters lobbing petrol bombs. An anti-racism rally in Syntagma Square leads to another violent confrontation between protesters and riot police when a group tries to deposit bags of rubbish at the foot of the new Christmas Tree; police use tear gas to disperse the protesters. A solidarity march in San Francisco enters an upscale mall, where a small riot ensues after police attempt to arrest marchers.

December 21: On the resort island of Crete, in the early morning hours, assailants throw petrol bombs at a bank, which is completely destroyed. The arsonists attack another bank before moving on to a car dealership. In Athens, the administration of Athens Polytechnic gives Greek police the authority to raid its grounds. The occupation of the GSEE headquarters ends voluntarily.

December 22: More than 3000 protestors chanting “Cops, Pigs, Murderers,” which has become the unofficial slogan of the youth protests, march through Athens, during which a group of youths overturn a police car; the march keeps many stores in downtown Athens closed. A group of high-school students stage a rally in front of the education ministry, which they announce will be their last before the holidays. Meetings occur at Athens Polytechnic to discuss the future of the occupation, it is decided that it will end voluntarily at the end of the week. Earlier, shots are fired at a riot police bus but the Athens Polytechnic campus, although none of the police on board are injured. The attack is assumed by many to be the work of provocateurs attempting to create a justification for police to raid the campus.

December 24: On Christmas Eve, about 700 protesters march peacefully through Athens’ main shopping district to demand the release of arrestees. At the city’s main cathedral, protestors chanting “Priests, thieves, pedophiles” spray paint slogans and anarchist symbols on the 17th century building’s marble columns and tear down a Greek flag; cathedral officials cancel a scheduled Christmas Eve service after the vandalism. Riot police cordon off the central Syntagma Square to protect the capital’s main Christmas tree. An anarchist group calling itself Nok1045’s offshoot. A group of hoodlums claims responsibility for a blast targeting the offices of a far-right political party earlier that morning; the homemade device, comprising several gas canisters, caused damage but no injuries.

December 25 and on: Christmas Day is mostly quiet in Greece. The riots wind down as the holidays send many home. But the following day, a government official’s car is firebombed in front of his house in Athens, while assailants target a bank with a Molotov cocktail and another group attacks a police car. The struggle continues over the following weeks.

* It is one of the few times in history that these two nations have stood on the same side of history as expression—proof once again that having been persecuted is not itself enough to prevent one from becoming a persecutor.

By December 12, police had used over 4600 capsules of tear gas, and were seeking more from Israel and Germany.*
Trouble in Paradise: Economic Crisis, Social Upheaval, and Anarchist Infrastructure

Greece is no longer ruled by a dictatorship, as it was until 35 years ago. According to the common sense of our era, there is no reason to riot in a democracy. Even if an employee of the state accidentally kills someone in the course of carrying out his duties, such misfortunes are simply an unfortunate side effect of the necessary role of the authorities in keeping the peace. When rioting does break out, it must be the work of a criminal minority not mature enough to understand the benefits and responsibilities of democracy; if it spreads, the only possible explanation is that a temporary irregularity in the economy is preventing citizens from participating in the capitalist market. The idea that government and capitalism themselves might be undesirable—that no authority should have the power to kill people in the first place—is unthinkable.

Accordingly, as soon as the scale of the response to Alexandros’s murder became clear, the corporate media turned away from the banners decrying police brutality and unaccountable authority, seizing instead on the idea that the unrest was the result of poor economic prospects for young Greeks. Some corporate outlets went so far as to announce—in language that might be less surprising in a magazine like this one—that the events in Greece might presage the second coming of the anti-globalization movement thought vanquished after September 11, 2001. Though that would hardly be unwelcome, we should be careful about taking up any narrative from the corporate media, lest it be a Trojan horse.

Are we to believe that—were the economy more stable—it would be acceptable to shoot 15-year-olds? In the years leading up to December 2008, the police gunned down countless people in the United States without anyone smashing a single store window. Is this simply because we had a lower unemployment rate? If we accept that the rage vented in Greece originated in economic conditions, the implication is that it is bound to be dispelled by economic solutions—and there are capitalist solutions for the crisis in no shorter supply than socialist ones. The exploitation and unemployment currently rampant in Greece could be exported to some meeker nation, or enough credit could be extended to the disaffected stone-throwers that they would come to identify as middle class themselves. These approaches have worked before; one might even argue that they have driven the process of capitalist globalization.

If Greece could somehow be transformed into Sweden—if every nation could be Sweden, without any having to be Nigeria—would it be ok to shoot teenagers then? They shoot anarchists in Sweden too, remember—for example, during the protests outside the European Union summit in Gothenburg in June 2001. So to the extent to which the Greek resistance is simply an expression of frustration at dim financial prospects, it can be defused or co-opted. But there are other forces at work that are invisible through the corporate lens.

Masked anarchists setting fires and fighting the police have been common in Greece since before the turn of the century. In 1999, shortly before the Seattle WTO protests, there were major riots during a visit from Bill Clinton. At the time, the economy was livelier—and the socialists were in power, which seems to contradict the theory that the current unrest is simply a result of dissatisfaction with the conservative government. On the contrary, the rioting in Greece was not simply an inevitable result of economic recession, but the fruit of decades of anarchist organizing. Though the rioting was provoked by the murder of Alexandros, it was only possible because of pre-existing infrastructures and social currents—otherwise, such murders would catalyze uprisings in the US as well. Such an immediate and resolute response would not have occurred if anarchists in Greece had not developed a culture conducive to it. Thanks to a network of social centers, a deep-seated sense that neighborhoods such as the one in which Alexandros was killed were liberated zones o-limitis to police, and a tradition of street resistance movements, owing to the heritage of struggle against the US-supported dictatorship.

In this regard, Greece is similar to Chile, another nation noted for the intensity of its street conflicts and class warfare. With the murder of Alexandros, anarchists finally had a narrative that was compelling to a great number of people. In another political context, liberals or other opportunists might have been able to exploit this tragedy to their own ends, but the Greek anarchists forestalled this possibility by immediately seizing the initiative and framing the terms of the conflict.

So whatever the corporate media alleged, the riots in Greece were not about the economy. That is to say, they were about the economy, but not just the economic hardships accompanying the recession—they were also a revolt against the exploitation, alienation, and hierarchy inherent in the capitalist system, all of which set the stage for police to murder teenagers whether or not there is widespread unemployment.

To repeat, if alienation and hierarchy alone were sufficient to inspire effective resistance, we would see more of it in the United States. The decisive factor in Greece was not the economy, nor the brutality of the police, but cumulative efforts that built a vibrant anarchist movement. There is no shortcut around developing an analogous movement in the US if we want to be capable of similar responses to oppression and injustice. Anarchists in the United States face a much different context than their Greek colleagues. Greece is a peripheral participant in the European Union, while the US remains the epicenter of global capitalism, with a correspondingly more powerful repressive apparatus. The consequences of participating in confrontations with police are potentially more severe in the US, at least in proportion to the support available to arrests. Much of the population is more conservative, and radical and oppressed communities are more fragmented, owing to the tremendous numbers of people in prison and the transience enforced by the job market. There is little continuity in traditions of resistance—in most communities, the collective anarchist memory does not stretch back beyond a decade at the most. The events in Greece are inspiring, but US anarchists can probably learn more from the infrastructures behind them than from the superficial aspects of the clashes. We might start by noting the role of the occupied universities as safe zones that provided a nerve center for the revolt, and brainstorming about how to create similar spaces on this continent. Likewise, radicals in the US can draw inspiration from Greek anarchists without forgetting what it was worthwhile in local anarchist communities. Though Greek anarchists clearly excel at confrontation, this does not guarantee that they are equally equipped to contest internal hierarchies and forms of oppression. The capacity to work out conflicts and maintain a horizontal distribution of power is as essential to the anarchist project as any kind of offense or defense. It would be unfortunate if fascination with the Greeks led US anarchists to deprioritize discussions about consent, consensus-based decision-making, and privilege.

The Insurrections to Come

At best, the events in Greece might help reframe the global context the way the Zapatista revolt did in 1994. The Greek riots are hardly the only recent conflict to occupy the world stage—tragically, the Israeli invasion of Gaza occurred immediately afterward—but they may be the most promising, in that they were explicitly directed against hierarchical power.

Most current hostilities, even if not organized by governments, are not as promising. Not everyone who takes up arms outside the state’s monopoly on violence is fighting for the abolition of hierarchy. Nationalist campaigns, fundamentalist crusades, religious conflicts, ethnic strife, and the gang warfare of illegal capitalism pit people against each other without any hope of liberation. Earlier in 2008, for example, South African rioters angry about their economic prospects carried out a series of brutal attacks on immigrant workers. Not only is there no guarantee that economic crises will produce riots, but when they do produce them there is no guarantee that this will be for the best.

We have to set visible precedents for liberation struggles if we hope future conflicts will pit the oppressed against their oppressors rather than against each other. This is especially important in times of crisis, when the initiative is up for grabs—if we do not seize it, liberals or fascists certainly will. Greece may be one such precedent, but it is far from enough. We can create similar precedents on smaller scales in the US by taking the initiative to determine the character of confrontations with authority. The mobilization at last summer’s Republican National Convention was arguably an example of this, though certainly not the only format for it; the riots in Oakland offers another model.

Today, party communism is largely discredited, and most resistance movements do not see seizing state power as feasible or desirable. This leaves two modes for proponents of social change. One is to support reformist heads of state such as Obama, Lula, and Chavez, who cash in on dissent to re-legitimize the state form and, as if incidentally, their own power. On the other hand, there is the possibility of a struggle against hierarchy itself—whether waged consciously, as in Greece, or as a result of complete social and economic marginalization, as it was in the suburbs of Paris in 2005. Such a path offers a long struggle with no victory in sight, but it is our only hope of reaching a new world.

“*In one heartening example of effective solidarity, the US government canceled a major arms shipment to Israel that had been scheduled to pass through Greek ports after Greek anarchists threatened to mobilize massive resistance.

How were the actions coordinated within cities? How about between cities?

VOID: There are hundreds of small, totally closed affinity groups—groups based in long-standing friendship and 100% trust—and some bigger groups like the people from the three big squares in Athens and three more in Thessaloniki. There are more than 50 social centers in Greece, and anarchist political spaces in all the universities around the country; also, the Anti-Hierarchical Movement has sections in all major cities. For all of them, Indymedia is very important as a strategic point for collecting and sharing useful information: where conflicts are happening, where the police are, where undercover police are making arrests, what is happening everywhere minute by minute; it is also useful on a political level, for publishing announcements and calls for demonstration and actions.

What kinds of organizing structures appeared?

VOID: a.) All sorts of small companies of friends were making spontaneous decisions in the streets, planning actions and carrying them out in a chaotic, uncontrollable manner: thousands of actions taking place at the same time everywhere around the country. b.) Every afternoon there was a General Assembly in occupied schools, public buildings, and universities. c.) Indymedia was used for announcements and strategic coordination. d.) The various communist parties also organized their own confederations of students.

e.) . . . And also, one especially influential federation was organized by friends of Alexis, to organize student demonstrations and occupations, and to publish general announcements from the students' struggle.

ANONYMOUS: The basic structures of organization were rooted in the occupying buildings. At first, there were the three biggest occupied universities in the center of Athens and the occupied GSEE, the union building, also in the center. In the occupied buildings, every day hundreds of people organized themselves through general meetings. In general, the ASOEE and Polytechnic University occupations functioned through self-organized committees and meetings, while in ASOEE, working groups and initiatives for different actions were also created. The occupation of the law school university, in which non-governmental, extreme leftists were participating, functioning through “direct democracy” structures, such as voting and the formation of associations. The GSEE occupation was somewhere in the middle; for example, they had a presiding board to coordinate and mediate the meetings. In addition, in some neighborhoods occupied public buildings were used successfully for public meetings. Some schools were also occupied by their students; I don’t know much about them, but we were always meeting the students on the street.

Were there any structures already in place that people used to organize?

VOID: For the young students who were in the streets for the first time, and also for the immigrants who participated, the telephone was enough; this produced a totally chaotic and unpredictable element in the situation. On the other hand, anarchists and anti-authoritarians have used General Assemblies as an organizing tool for the last 30 years during any kind of movement: all affinity groups, squats, social centers, universities occupations, and other organizations have their own assemblies, as well. During the fight, a lot of new working groups and initiatives were organized, and new coordinating networks of high-school students.

ANONYMOUS: Anarchists and the anti-authoritarians typically organize through self-organized meetings that are announced via a call out. There are also some armed structures, like the self-organized spaces (“stekia”) in the neighborhoods and some universities, and some self-organized associations in workplaces and battle groups. Of course, there are also squatted houses; nowadays we are seeing an increasing number of squatting actions, mostly in the countryside.

What different kinds of people participated in the actions?

VOID: The majority were anarchists, half of them older ones who come into the streets only in very important struggles, as most have previous charges and would have to face prison time if they were arrested. Besides them were thousands of students 16-18 years old. Alongside these groups were immigrants, thousands of university students, many “grumpy” Romansi kids taking revenge for social repression and racism, and old revolutionaries with experience from previous social struggles.

ANONYMOUS: Lots of different kinds of people participated. Students got organized all over Greece in the same way—from poor neighborhoods to rich and bourgeois neighborhoods. A great number of youth, university students, precarious workers, young workers, and unemployed people took part in the actions. Theater students and actors and actresses stopped several theater performances. Hooligans participated as well, not on a political basis but because of their hatred of police and the system. Workers participated too, as the occupation of the GSEE building indicates. In contrast to the students, the workers who took part were mostly radical minorities who were already politically active. Many of them also participated in the occupations in their neighborhoods. The participation of first- and second-generation immigrants in the clashes was impressive. Lots of them took part in the clashes and expropriations on Monday, December 8, and many were arrested. During those days, the Romani groups that live in Athens also fought against the cops.

Politically, the greatest proportion of people who took part in the new blogs appeared to be active anarchists and anti-authoritarians and people close to that scene who are not politically organized. These are the people behind the occupations and the movement that continues today. On the other hand, the uprising superseded this political arena as well as the left organizations that participated.

What different forms did the actions take?

VOID: a.) Smashing, looting, and burning were the primary tactics used by young people. They often attacked expensive shopping districts, opened the luxury shops, took everything from inside, and set fire to it in order to counteract the effects of the tear gas in the air. Many turned cars upside down to serve as barricades, keeping the police at a distance and thus creating liberated areas. The police used over 4600 tear gas bombs—nearly 4 tons—but people set countless fires, enough to maintain areas in which you could breathe despite this chemical warfare.

When the thousands of people on the streets realized that the black smoke of the fires could cancel out the white smoke of the tear gas, they took up this tactic... of setting fires. Other tactics included smashing up the pavement with hammers to produce stones for use as projectiles, and, of course, producing and throwing firebombs. This last tactic was used especially to force riot police to fear and respect the demonstrators, and also in order to control the space and time of attack and escape.

b.) Attacks with sticks, stones, and Molotov cocktails were carried out against countless banks, police stations, and police cars across the country. In smaller cities, banks and police were the primary or only targets, as the small-scale society and face-to-face relations discouraged attacks on shops, with the exception of a few multinational franchises.

c.) Groups of 50-70 people carried out hundreds of symbolic occupations in all kinds of public buildings, municipal offices, public service offices, theaters, radio stations, TV stations, and other buildings. Also, there were many symbolic acts of sabotage and blockades of streets, highways, offices, metro stations, public services, and so on, usually accompanied by the distribution of thousands of pamphlets.

d.) Every day there were silent protests, street theater, and non-violent actions in front of the parliament and in other cities.

Most of these were brutally attacked by police.

e.) Leftists organized concerts in public spaces for underground bands and political groups. The actions of the first night were mostly carried out by anarchists and anti-authoritarians, on the second day, the uprising spread to the political left, and on the third day the students and a great part of the rest of society took part. The people were informed much later than the anarchists as to why they were being attacked. For many, it was a surprise that so many young people adopted the tactics of “anarchist violence, smashing and burning,” but this was a result of the generalized influence that anarchists have had over the past four years.

Anonymous: All of these tactics had been used before by anarchists and anti-authoritarians, but until the December revolt they were repressed by police and resulted in lots of arrests. The actions of the first night were carried out by anarchists and anti-authoritarians; on the second day, the struggle spread to the political left, and on the third day the students and a great part of the rest of society took part. The actions were encouraged by the determination and passion of the first people who reacted and the effectiveness of their direct action. And, of course, we should not forget the anger of the police about the murder of Alexis that sparked the revolt.

Concerning the spread of the actions beyond anarchists and anti-authoritarians, I think it’s not necessary to have experience to throw a stone, make a barricade, or smash a shop window. We saw students 15 or 14 years old making Molotov cocktails.

Anonymous: There was also commodity expropriation. On December 8, the peak of the uprising, a lot of people—mostly immigrants—participated in this. There was also a great deal of organized commodity expropriation to support the occupations.

How many of the participants had previously been involved in similar actions?

Void: Of the participants, several thousand were experienced anarchist insurrectionists, anti-authoritarians, and libertarian autonomists. There were also several thousand young people who had been radicalized over the preceding three years during the struggles for Social Insurance and against the privatization of education, and also in the huge spontaneous demonstrations that took place during the fires that burned almost 25% of the natural areas of Greece during summer of 2007.

We estimate that for about 30% of the people, this was their first rioting.

Which of the tactics used in the uprising had been used before in Greece? Did they spread in the course of this rebellion? If they did, how did that occur?

Void: Most of the tactics used in this struggle have been used here for a long time now. The most important new characteristic of this uprising was the immediate outbreak of actions all around the country. The assassination of a young boy in the most important area of anarchist activity provoked an instantaneous reaction; within five minutes of his death, anarchist cells all over the country had been activated. In some cases, the police were informed much later than the anarchists as to why they were being attacked. For many, it was a surprise that so many young people adopted the tactics of “anarchist violence, smashing and burning,” but this was a result of the generalized influence that anarchists have had over the past four years.

Anonymous: Any conflicts emerge between participants in the uprising?

Void: The Communist Party separated itself from anarchists and leftists, organizing separate demonstrations. Also, the announcements that the Communist Party published, their statements in the corporate media, their speeches to the parliament, and the negative propaganda that they carried on against all leftist organizations prove that they are a real enemy of social change.

Anonymous: Some little problems occurred in the squatted places with people addicted to heroin or who stole things from the squats. There was a lot of discussion about the commodification expropriation, when it was used for personal profit by selling the stuff on the black market. Leftists tried to stop these actions, arguing that the people who do this are only thearies. In the end, they didn’t manage to stop them. Also, leftists unsuccessfully tried to stop the clashes and attacks by making chains separating the demonstrators from the rioters.

What is the opinion of the “general public” about the actions?

Void: What is called the “general public” during a period of tele-democracy is something that demands a lot of consideration.

Generally speaking, the “general public” feels fear when the TV says that were “burning the poor people’s shops,” but the people know well what kind of shops are in the expensive districts where the riots took place; they feel fear when the TV says that angry immigrants came out to the streets and broke, but they also know that the immigrants are poor and desperate, and that it was only a minority of them that came to the streets. Many artists, theoreticians, sociologists, and other such personages offered explanations about the revolt, and many of them were beneficial for our cause; some were probably trapped by their need to participate in the spirit of the times, while others were using the situation as an opportunity to honestly express their real ideas. The “general public” is afraid of the murder of a 12-year-old boy by a police officer, and they hate the police much more than before; anyway, nobody liked the police in the first place. The police don’t trust the right wing government or the past (and probably future) socialist government, and they don’t like the police, expensive shops, or banks. Now a new public opinion is appearing that includes all the social and ethical justifications for revolt. If it was difficult to govern Greece before, now it will be much more difficult.

Anonymous: A great part of society supported the young people, for many reasons: the murder of the child, the economic crisis, the general decadence of the Greek state. The general consciousness says: “we can’t go on like this; the children are right.” On the other hand, the conservative/fascist part of the society—which is not so big here—focused on looting and damage to property, alleging that the workers would have to pay for it.

How important to the context of these events is the legacy of the dictatorship in Greece? How does it influence popular opinion?

Anonymous: In general, 19th century Greek history was characterized by repressive regimes rather than social peace and consent. The last example of that was the dictatorship. Since then, there have been 35 years of social peace. During these years, police repression and brutality have continued: state murders, torture, cooperation between police and fascists. This has been highlighted consistently in anarchist and left propaganda to reveal the parallels between democracy and dictatorship.

A common slogan in the uprising was “the agreement of Varkiza broke up,” relating the events of December 1944 to December 2008.
In 1944, there was a civil war between antifascist partisans and the Greek state, which was supported by the middle class and England.
In December 1944, the agreement of Varkiza was signed by the communist party, leading the partisans to surrender all firearms.
From then until the dictatorship there was a repressive state supported by the right wing and fascists.

In 1973, the young people were the only ones who took the risk to revolt against the seven-year-running dictatorship; even if this was not the only cause of the end of dictatorship, it remains in the collective memory that the students saved Greece from the dictators and the domination of the US. It is a common belief that young people will put themselves at great risk for the benefit of all, and this produces a feeling of hope and tolerance of their actions. Of course, this is now an old story, and though it influences the context of the confrontations, it is not mentioned in reference to them.

Another influence comes from the student struggles of 1991 and 1995 against the privatization of education, which forced the government to change plans and preserved public education to the present day. Granted, the revolt of December 2008 was probably the apex of the anarchist movement in Greece
thus far, as it appeared all around the country and with a great deal of influence on the ac-ctions and ideas of a general part of society;
but the earlier student struggles, especially in Athens in 1991, were more visible and more generalized.

Do you think the economic crisis was as influential in setting the stage for the uprising as the corporate media alleged?

Young people from the wealthy areas of Athens also attacked police stations in their neighborhoods, so even the class war Marxists are at a loss to explain what is happening. The separation of the rich and poor doesn’t seem to matter as much as longexisting solidarity and participation in the fight for equality and social justice.

According to some accounts, Alexandros was not murdered in cold blood, but rather hit by a ricocheting bullet.
Demonstrators didn’t buy it.
On the other hand, it is true that because of the economic Greeks between the ages of 25 and 35 cannot start families. Greece is the most underpopulated society in all Europe. But here we don’t talk about that as the cause of the revolt. Young people are angry and they hate the police, capitalist cynicism, and the government in a natural, instinctual way that doesn’t require explanations or a political agenda. The local media avoid speaking in depth about social conditions here the way the English, French, and US media have. Local corporate TV stations attempt to pass off lies about chaotic “masketeers” with no ideas and no social identity because the moral influence of anarchists is so strong now that they start to talk about our ideas seriously on television society could explode. With the exception of some TV programs and newspapers, most of the mass media are trying to keep economic issues separate from the revolt.

Even the leftists of the May ‘68 generation, when they speak to the media, say that the riots are not political expressions of the needs and hopes of the people—that anarchists and young people don’t have the ability to express a political agenda, and the people need other kinds of political representation. Of course, all this has little influence on the young people who will participate in the social struggles of the future, as after this struggle there is a lot of tension and a great distance between younger people and any kind of political leadership or authority.

ANONYMOUS: The economic crisis is obvious in every aspect of our lives at the moment. There are intense layoffs and the Greek state is close to declaring bankruptcy. Greece has the lowest salaries in Europe, the highest percentage of unemployed young people, and the greatest number of people living under the poverty line. There is a general feeling that the majority of society is working just to make the banks richer. The politicians, media moguls, and priests are all involved in scandals involving billions of Euros, which come from the wealth we produce. When all this is happening and the government says it is going to give 28 billion to the banks because of the economic crisis and we’ll have to work more for less money to save the banks, then it is logical that a huge number of people will support attacks on banks.
Throughout December, barricades, clashes, and university occupations transformed the social and political landscape of Greece.

What other motivations, besides rage against the police and the economy, inspired people to participate?

VOID: The personal and collective need for adventure; the need to participate in making history; the chaotic negation of any kind of politics, political parties, and “serious” political ideas; the hatred of any TV star, sociologist, or expert who claims to be able to analyze you as a social phenomenon, the need to be heard as you are; the enthusiasm of fighting against the authorities and ridiculing the riot police; the power in your heart and the fire in your hands; the amazing experience of throwing Molotovs and stones at the cops in front of the parliament; in the expensive shopping districts, or in your small silent town, in your village, in the square of your neighborhood.

Other motivations include the shared feeling of planning an action with your best friends, making it happen, and later hearing people tell you about this action as an incredible story that they heard from someone else; the enthusiasm of reading about some action that you did with your friends in a newspaper or TV program from the other side of the planet; the feeling that you are responsible for creating stories that will become examples for the future struggles. It is also the great celebrative fun of smashing shops, taking products and burning them, seeing the false promises of capitalism smoldering in the streets; the hatred for all authorities, the need to take part in a collective ceremony of revenge for the murder of a person that could have been you, the personal vendetta of feeling that the police have to pay for the death of Alexis across the whole country; the need to send a powerful message to the government if police violence increases, we have the power to fight back—that they have to take us seriously because we are everywhere and we are going to change everything.

ANONYMOUS: With uprisings, protests, demonstrations, and occupations people are coming closer and meeting in the streets and in buildings that were formerly only places where commodities were transferred. Revolt enables people to develop an idea of a collective and communal life. Another slogan that expresses this situation is “Call your loneliness or go out again to the street of fire,” mostly used after the end of the student movement of 2006-2007.

Did political parties succeed in co-opting energy from the uprising?

VOID: In “real” numbers [as of late December], the Socialists increased their lead over the right wing government, gaining an 8% lead in the polls, the “European Social Forum communists” lost 1% even though they helped the revolt, but still they are in third place with 12%; the Communist Party has 8%, the Nationalist neo-fascists 4.5%, and the Green Party is holding steady at 3.5%.

It is also interesting that the leader of the Socialists appears now to be regarded as the most “capable of governing the country” after many years of being less popular than the right wing prime minister. The riots had a great effect on the political scene: the political parties seemed unable to understand, explain, or react to the massive wave of violence and participation from every level of society. Their announcements were irrelevant to what was really happening. Their popularity decreased dramatically among the younger population, who don’t see themselves in the logic and the politics of the political parties and don’t feel represented by them.

ANONYMOUS: SYRIZA, one reformist alternative party of the left—it can be compared with the green parties—increased significantly in popularity after the student movement of 2006-7, because it addressed the “700 Euro generation” [the younger Greeks for whom the average salary is 700 Euro a month] and the fight for a free education. Also, it is the only party that supports those who are imprisoned, in contrast with the communist party KKE that always insists resistance is only the work of provocateurs. Now it is difficult for SYRIZA to co-opt energy from the uprising because they support peaceful demonstrations as a means of struggle. The same goes for other small non-governmental parties.

What was the role of anarchists in starting and continuing the actions? How clearly was their participation seen by the rest of society?

VOID: Over the past few years, anarchists have created a network of communities, groups, organizations, squads, and social centers in almost all the major cities in Greece. Many don’t like each other, as there are significant differences between groups. “The personal vendetta of feeling that the police have to pay for the death of Alexis across the whole country: the need to send a powerful message to the government if police violence increases, we have the power to fight back...”
and individuals. This helps the movement, though, as the movement now can encompass a variety of approaches. Many different kinds of people find comrades in different parts of the anarchist movement and, all together, push each other—in a positive, if antagonistic, way—to communicate with society at large. This communication includes creating neighborhood assemblies, participating in social struggles, and planning actions that are relevant and meaningful to a wide range of people. After 30 years of anti-social anarchism, today’s Greek anarchist movement, despite all its problems, limitations, and internal conflicts, has the capability to look beyond the anarchist microcosm and take actions that improve society at large in ways that are readily apparent. Of course, it will take a lot of effort to realize this in practice.

As for the role of anarchists in starting and continuing the actions, especially at the beginning—Saturday and Sunday, December 6 and 7—and also in the continuation after Wednesday, December 10, anarchists constituted the vast majority. In the middle days, especially on Monday when the destructive Armageddon took place, students and immigrants played a very important role. But the vast majority of students found it easy to feel satisfied after one, two, or three days of smashing, and then went home or attended demonstrations with a more pacifist atmosphere. Likewise, immigrants had to face a very strong backlash from locals, and were afraid to return to the streets.

So the 20,000 anarchists in Greece started it, and continued it when everybody else returned to normality. And we have to mention that the fear of returning to normality helped us keep up the fight for ten days more, putting ourselves into great danger, as acts of vengeance for the assassination of our comrade were transformed, in our fantasies, into preparations for a general strike. Now European society knows once and for all what a social insurrection looks like, and that it is not difficult to change the world in a few weeks.

But you need everyone to participate and play a role. The young people of Greece have sent an invitation to all the societies of Europe. We are now awaiting their responses.

ANONYMOUS: People see the role of anarchists and anti-authoritarians in initiating
At this point everyone has realized that the riots aren’t just the work of a few young people in sweatshirts.

How much visibility do anarchists have in Greece in general? How “seriously” is anarchism taken by the majority of Greek people?

VOID: You could say that it has only been three or four years now since anarchists started to take ourselves “seriously.” It’s only in the past few years that we have succeeded in expanding beyond the limitations of the anti-police strategy that characterized our efforts for 25 years. In that strategy, we would attack the police, they would arrest people, and we would do solidarity actions, over and over again. Of course, the anti-police attacks continue, and the prisoner solidarity movement is stronger than ever, but the anti-social element inside the anarchist movement is under conscious self-control and we can speak and act for the benefit of our whole society, now, using tactics that can be comprehended by at least a part of that society.

Many actions, like the attacks on supermarkets and the free distribution of stolen products, have become popular and accepted. The attacks on banks, especially following the economic crisis, are also accepted, and the attacks on police stations have been adopted and utilized by high-school students around the country. In one way or another, we have been the first subject on the news for the last 15 days [as of late December]. Generally speaking, with our participation in students’ or workers’ struggles and also in ecological struggles, every week some action offers visibility to the anarchist movement.

This doesn’t mean that “anarchism” is taken seriously by the majority of Greek people; most people still believe the media portrayal of us as “masketeers” and criminals, and don’t have any idea how an anarchist society could function—that includes most anarchists, also, who refuse to address this question! But our actions and ideas have a strong influence now on left and progressive people. It’s no longer possible to say that we don’t exist, and our existence is radicalizing the majority of the younger generation.

ANONYMOUS: Those who are politically active recognize anarchists and anti-authoritarians as a part of the movement, because this scene intervenes in a lot of fields around Greece: workplace initiatives, self-organized spaces in schools and the universities (the “stekia,” which increased in number after the student movement of 2006-2007), neighborhood and environmental issues including free spaces in the neighborhoods, supporting immigrants, and fighting sexism. Before the December uprisings, a lot of commodity expropriations from big supermarket chains were carried out by groups of anarchists and anti-authoritarians.

Groups would enter a supermarket close to a street market and take as much of the basic foodstuffs as they could—oil, bread, cheese, and cleaning products. The re-appropriated goods were then distributed for free to the people at the street market. Society supported these actions. Consequently those who previously formed their opinions from the media were forced to think differently, and with the spread of this revolt some of them have changed their minds.

What role have subcultural groups such as punk and squatting played in making the uprising possible?

VOID: After ’93, there was a strong initiative in the Greek anarchist movement—an accompanied by many internal conflicts—that eliminated the influence of “subcultural” styles inside the movement. This means that there is no punk, rock, metal, or any other subcultural identity that defines the Greek anarchist movement; you can be whatever you like, you can listen to whatever music you like, you can have whatever style or fashion you like, but that is not a political identity.

In the street fights of December, many “emos” participated, together with hippy freaks and ravers, punks, heavy metal boys and girls, and also trendy, “normal” kids and students who like Greek music. It has to be social and political consciousness, social critiques and collective understanding that bring you to participate in the anarchist movements, not fashion. Of course, for at least the last 19 years, the Void Network and similar collectives have played the role of offering a cultural introduction to radical political spaces. Such groups organize many cultural and political events, festivals, and parties every year and have the power to attract thousands and thousands of people to underground cultures. But even the Void Network doesn’t create subcultural identities or separate different subcultures; instead we try to organize events that involve most of the underground cultures. It’s true, though, that the majority of the people in the scene attend and participate in most of the events of the d.i.y. underground; many events are organized every month in liberated spaces.

ANONYMOUS: In Greece, the music subcultures—punk and hip hop—are the same as in the West. Housing squats are not very common, because most young people live with their parents until their 30s, more or less. Of course, the subcultures influence the political thinking of the youth.

What things have made the anarchist movement healthy in Greece?

VOID: The separation from subcultural identity politics made people understand that to be an anarchist it takes much more serious participation, creativity, and action than just wearing a t-shirt with the antichrist on it and walking around punk concerts drinking beer and taking pills. Now there is an
we saw that the struggles change the psychology of that I remember in social winning had managed to years. For the first time, without the feeling of that had happened... of the universe, but that at any time you can power; you know that you are not the center disappearing again; you know how to become You are used to appearing, fighting, and then to have expectations, because then you can't struggle that will never end. It is healthy not to give your life, your time, your years in a crazy and enthusiastic, to feel that you can proper course of action is; you have to be prepare actions or advance struggles. You likewise, you should participate every week gans and manifesting an anarchist presence; understanding that to be an anarchist you makes it more difficult for the state to re-press us.

In what ways do you think the anarchist move-ment in Greece could be better or stronger?

VOID: We need to find more intelligent ways of explaining our ideas to people. We need techniques for communicating with all of society, better ways to frame the struggle in its social context. In a tele-democracy, where politicians are nothing more than television superstars, our refusal to communicate with or through the mass media is healthy, but we need to find new ways to overcome the mass media "concerns reality" and the propaganda against us. As long as whatever the TV shows "exists" and whatever doesn't appear on TV "doesn't exist," we will be there with our crazy ideas, dangerous actions, and street fights to break the normality of the TV program, we will use the negative advertise-ment of our ways to link all the different slogans and dreams of the common people. But how can we explain our ideas to everyone? How can we help people cease to trust the media? How can we come into contact with millions and millions of people?

It will take millions and millions of posters and free pamphlets, traveling from hand to hand in the whole country; but it will take also a huge wave of participation, a huge wave of invitations for demonstrations and participa-tion in social struggles; it will take more free public services in spheres that the govern-ment doesn't cover—anarchist doctors and teachers, free food, free accommodation, information, underground culture, and so on. It will take more and more media actions and social centers. If you can start a squat, that is better, but even if it's not possible to squat in your town, rent a building with your friends, make a collective, start an assembly, and put the black or red-and-black flag at the entrance. Start offering the people of your city a living example of a world without racism, patriarchy, or homophobia—a place of equal-ity, freedom, and respect for differences, of love and sharing. We are more "antinomia" in the insurrectionism of the Greek anarchist movement, to make it shine as a paradigm of a new wave of social life and demonstrate this novel survival methodology in the metropoli.

ANONYMOUS: As I mentioned before, we need more in-tervention in social issues. The uprising gave us the oppor-tunity to overcome the "adolescent stage"—lots of young people participate in the scene, but when they start to work, they insert themselves totally into the system. Because the anarchist and anti-authoritarian scene does not intervene strongly in labor issues, many workers come under the con-trol of the unions and left parties, which play the same role as the bosses. Consequently, workers cannot self-organize, and instead everybody just focuses on individual survival. I think that the evolution of the movement over the com-ing months will be all the more powerful because of the economic crisis; it's important to overcome the sectarian tendencies that existed before the uprising if we want to go in a revolutionary direction.

How effective has police repression been in shutting down the anarchist movement? How have people resisted it?

VOID: The dreams and plans of the insurrectionists came true: a huge wave of participation, a huge wave of action, and for many chaotic days people traveled and fought in the city like never before, in an unfamiliar time and space. In the same days, of course, they came face to face with the limits of the insurrection. Now people spend hours discussing how to expand popular understanding and invent approaches that will sustain and enrich the struggle. Many people think about ways to link at all the different slogans and dreams of the common people. The police repression didn't play a more important role in the conclusion of the riots than physical fatigue. All of us share a feeling of completion and a feeling of beginning, and the police cannot touch those feelings.

ANONYMOUS: Repression has definitely increased since the student movement of 2006. The cops try to surround every demonstration held by anarchists and anti-authoritarians. They attack first, using tear gas and chemicals, and arrest a huge number of people. Our answer has been massive demon-strations and more—sticks, helmets, masks—when we are alone in the streets, so we can avoid getting surrounded by the police. There's also a great deal of solidarity extended to those who are arrested: continuous demonstrations outside the courts and prisons, legal help, and so on. Thanks to these solidarity actions, the courts are forced either to release people or to convict them with smaller punishments. I think that during this uprising, the cops lost the ball. At the beginning, after the murder, they had orders only to defend, not to attack—to be careful not to kill someone else or be caught on TV beating students. Consequently it was difficult for them to repress the uprising, especially when there were attacks all around Greece.

Of course, the cops are supported by the fascists, who pose as outraged citizens who want to protect their property in order to attack demonstrators. Fascists are more difficult to fight because they can do everything that is illegal for the police, such as stabbing people or entering the occupations or the asylum in the universities. From our side, we accuse the state of cooperating with the fascists, and this makes our movement bigger, because of the general antifascist senti-ment in Greek society.

What do you think the final result of the events of December 2008 will be?

ANONYMOUS: I haven't lived through a major economic crisis or an uprising, so I can't speak confidently about it. The ultimate result of the revolt. I hope the struggle will spread to the neighborhoods and everywhere, and bring people together to change our lives and attack the system. At the same time, I am afraid that the left parties will try to control the movement. There are two things that are certain about December 2008.

1. In Greek society, too, all camps are already created. In the first are the youth and people in revolt; opposite them are the petit bourgeois and the landlords. For a moment, the uprising took the characteristics of a civil war, and it’s going to continue. The question is whether or not the workers didn’t take a side yet will do so and even the odds against their bosses.

2. There is no longer the feeling of being the losers that I remember in social struggles over the past 25 years. There is a common feeling that we won, we beat the system. For the first time, we saw that the struggles that had happened without the feeling of winning had managed to change the psychology of our whole society.
MUSIC AS A WEAPON
THE CONTENTIOUS SYMBIOSIS OF PUNK ROCK & ANARCHISM

“People talk about ‘preaching to the converted’ —well who fucking converted them?”
-Penny Rimbaud of Crass

From Victor Jara to the MC5 and Public Enemy, music has been important in countless cultures of resistance. It’s no secret that a great proportion of those currently active in anarchist circles have at some point been part of the punk counterculture; indeed, many were first exposed to anarchist ideas via punk. There are two ways to look at this. Perhaps it’s merely circumstantial: the same traits that make people seek out anarchism also predispose them to enjoy aggressive, independently produced music. At the other extreme, one could argue that music that pushes aesthetic and cultural boundaries can imply a wider spectrum of possibility in other spheres of life as well—that is to say, that there has been something intrinsically subversive about punk.

and enabled us to open a dialogue about the social struggles to come. As the slogan of December 2008 in Athens and Exarchia goes:

WE ARE AN IMAGE FROM THE FUTURE.
Disenchantment: The term “punk” has been used to describe an incredibly broad range of phenomena over the past three and a half decades. In this analysis, it refers to the social and cultural networks associated with the do-it-yourself underground, not to any particular musical style or fashion. Yet vitriolic indictments of the limitations of youth subcultures do not suffice to transcend them. It might be that despite all the drawbacks, it is better for people to discover anarchist ideas via punk than it would be for there to be even fewer avenues in which to encounter them. For a critique to be useful, it must indicate an alternative, and differentiate between incidental and inherent flaws. It is unfair and unrealistic to expect the punk scene to produce anarchists free of subcultural baggage. It might be better to take its shortcomings in stride and focus instead on creating an anarchist movement that makes the best of its subcultural roots while endeavoring to grow beyond them.

For perspective, we might look at other music-based subcultures that have helped to propagate value systems. Reggae music has been instrumental in the proliferation of Rastafarianism, for example, but one rarely hears Rastafarians complain about those brought in via reggae being trendy, alienating, and hopelessly co-opted. On the contrary, many Rastafarians hold reggae music in high esteem as a means of bringing people together and celebrating Rastafarian beliefs. Contrast this with Crass gleefully announcing that punk was dead—in 1978! To be fair, one of the ways punk retained its vitality and autonomy for so long was its constant rebelling against itself, but there’s no sense in seeking to expand the anarchist movement by rejecting one of the primary venues through which people have discovered it.

Alternately, perhaps anarchist values took root in the punk scene precisely because they were so marginalized elsewhere: in an era when radical ideas are pushed to the periphery, peripheral subcultures are bound to be crowded with them. One might hypothesize that this creates a feedback loop that keeps those ideas marginal, as they are not associated with popular or successful initiatives. The reification of obscurity and failure that made punk hospitable terrain for obscure and failed revolutionary ideas certainly did not encourage their new participants to win out outside the punk ghetto. But the self-imposed exile of the punk community has also been an effective defense mechanism through an era of capitalist standardization. The punk scene has helped keep anarchist ideas alive over the past thirty years in the same way that monasteries preserved science and literature through the Dark Ages. Although the demands and influence of the capitalist economy reentered the same power imbalances and materialism that punk had hoped to escape—and thus in turn limited the punk critique of capitalism to a variant of the liberal maxim “buy local”—it is more than ever in the punk scene’s capacity to inspire participants to take its shortcomings in stride and focus instead on creating an anarchist movement that makes the best of its subcultural roots while endeavoring to grow beyond them. Thus the punk scene provided the music industry a free testing and development site for new bands and trends, but this process also served to cleanse it of parasites on a regular basis.

Far from MTV talent scouts, competing independent labels, and alternative consumerism, you could occasionally find something truly beautiful and free at the heart of the d.i.y. underground. At best, it was a space in which the roles of protagonist and audience became interchangeable and the dictates of the dominant culture were shaken off. Let’s contrast this format with the models of anarchist activism and outreach that are currently in vogue. While anarchist activism typically focuses on matters outside the daily lives of the participants, and thus tends to cost more energy than it generates, d.i.y. punk was basically pleasure-oriented, offering activities that were fulfilling in and of themselves. While this often appeared merely frivolous, sociality and affirmation are as essential as food or housing. In some areas, the punk scene was significantly more working class and underclass than much of the current anarchist milieu; this may indicate that it provided for real needs, rather than catering to the middle class preferences of protagonist and audience became interchangeable and the dictates of the dominant culture were shaken off. Punk had been exciting in contrast to corporate rock, it offered a relatively unmediated experience: one could meet one’s favorite musicians, dance and interact outside the prescriptions of a repressive society, even form one’s own band and remake the subculture itself. Thousands of people attended Black Flag shows because they offered a genuinely different experience than anything corporate capitalism had to offer. But once the internet made every band into its own promotions agency and youtube.com made it possible for everyone to appear on the equivalent of MTV, independent music was no less mediated than corporate music, and no less vapid.

Anarchists often complained that in practice the punk scene was full of people with tepid revolutionary values. Unfortunately, if you want to be able to introduce new people to anarchism, you are going to have to deal with a lot of people who are not that interested in the culture that connects them are still evolving. For example, while a punk zine written from an anarchist perspective could be instructive to examine why punk has taken root in nations outside any rigid ideological framework contributed to it being a more fertile and unpredictable space than many more explicitly radical milieus have been.

Though critics often accuse the punk scene of being nothing more than a playpen for privileged consumers, punk has been integral in the resurgence of anarchist ideas far outside the US and Europe.9 While punk originated in Britain and the US, a great proportion of the development of underground punk has been especially instrumental in revitalizing anarchism in contexts in which there was no radical alternative to Marxist hegemony. It would be instructive to examine why punk has taken root in nations like Brazil, Malaysia, and the Philippines but not India or most Arabic-speaking nations, and study how this correlates with the spread of anarchist ideas over the past thirty years.

Punk and Resistance: A Trajectory

The first major wave of politicized punk can probably be traced to the British band Crass, which drew on Dadaism and other avant-garde traditions to fashion early punk rock into a form of cultural agitprop. Decades later, a visitor to Britain could find small circles of middle-aged anarcho-punks who had been politicized by Crass, by the Rolling Thunder and accessibility group works; operating in decentralized networks and at fast pace; it was an art form people for who routinely traveled across the country to engage in rowdy subcultural events to shift to traveling across the country to participate in rowdy anticapitalist demonstrations. It has been said that punk was one of the last remnants of the punk movement that was largely original. As often as there was no larger revolutionary movement, punk music and culture had become more experimental as punk sought to match daring aesthetics to radical rhetoric. There had always been a tension in punk between the folk art aspects of the music, and the desire to innovate and challenge the cultural establishment. Punk had been seen as political, but there was no real distinction between subcultural identity and political action. One of the primary political aims of punk was to make people think. Punk became a way of approaching life in general, thus limiting its readerhip and influence readers coming from a range of political perspectives on everything from feminism to firearms; d.i.y. movement. Magazines such as Profane Existence included radiating phenomena eventually break into their constituent elements and stabilize. The Swedish band Refused, for example, who had combined hardcore, techno, jazz, and classical music on their final album, split amid member who had booked the His Hero Is Gone show after Millions for Mumia and later played a role in anarchist organizing around the Republican National Convention of 2000 came to perform with his band, but headed home afterwards instead of attending the demonstration scheduled for the following day. A few years later, the split between punk and anarchism was complete. Even Against Me, the progenitors of the folk punk reaction to the stagnation of the anarcho-punk scene, had deserted the d.i.y. movement and embraced their former anarchist politics. From Ashes Rise, who had been delegates of the uncompromisingly punk rock band His Hero Is Gone, signed to a label record and recorded a final album with songs about nuclear war—a regression to 1960s nostalgia all the more absurd in the midst of the Iraq war—before breaking up. Punk—at least for that generation—that had reached the end of its trajectory as a force for social change.

Technology, Legitimacy, and Accessibility

Let’s return to the resurgence of folk punk shortly after the turn of the century. His Hero Is Gone had been one of the first d.i.y. bands to shift from single releases to full-length albums. In May 2002, when a couple of Boston anarchists staged a Mayday festival, a rupture had developed between the aesthetic and political elements in the subculture, evident in tensions between punk who only attended for the shows and anarchists striving to establish a revolutionary movement. To name a single example, the person who had booked the His Hero Is Gone show after Millions for Mumia and later played a role in anarchist organizing around the Republican National Convention of 2000 came to perform with his band, but headed home afterwards instead of attending the demonstration scheduled for the following day. A few years later, the split between punk and anarchism was complete. Even Against Me, the progenitors of the folk punk reaction to the stagnation of the anarcho-punk scene, had deserted the d.i.y. movement and embraced their former anarchist politics. From Ashes Rise, who had been delegates of the uncompromisingly punk rock band His Hero Is Gone, signed to a label record and recorded a final album with songs about nuclear war—a regression to 1960s nostalgia all the more absurd in the midst of the Iraq war—before breaking up. Punk—at least for that generation—that had reached the end of its trajectory as a force for social change.

9 This point is also made in an overview written in South Africa, “Non-Western Anarchisms: Refiguring the Global Context.”

9 On June 19, 1999, a global day of action coinciding with the 25th G8 summit, London was shut down by a Reclaim the Capitalism riot that resulted in masscisting. The independent news coverage of this event prouged the indignity network that was formed during the Toronto demonstrations against the G8 summit in Seattle five months earlier, and heralded a new era of anticapitalist organizing.
Anyone familiar with the inner workings of the music industry knows that proliferation of the latter was particularly ironic in that the d.i.y. place in genuinely decentralized structures, but more of it was built distribution networks and zine cultures with the on-hand our lives feel unreal and insignificant. “real” in the sense that everything on television is “real” while control of the Warsaw ghetto at the very moment it was destroyed, because they were using technology that had been largely o≠ during which record-releasing and printing technology produced them to it. the process of rebelling against the corporations that intro-duced access to resources. A drama troupe could travel without expense equipment, be it a shoddy cardboard puppet stage or teniences in the course of their shift to corporate careerism. the flagship band Against Me shifted to standard rock instru-ments in the course of their shift to corporate careerism.

For all we know, a resurgence of d.i.y. culture is taking place at this very moment, and we’re simply not positioned to notice it. Doubtless somewhere in the world the cyberspace described above are beginning again, it’s only a matter of time before some shoot-off of the old d.i.y. scene adapts to the new technological context. The end of punk has been prematurely announced annually for over three decades, and this may well go on three decades more.

The point is not to predict the future of youth subcultures, but to derive lessons about how to build anarchist communities and momentum. If punk is finally dead, we’ll need to create other spaces for people to discover anarchism, if it’s not, we’ll still need to do much better if we hope to bring about a revolution. Which characteristics of the punk scene should we emulate, and which could we improve on?

Punk’s long run as a breeding ground for anarchism shows how much we stand to gain from social activities that are plea-surable and creative. In nurturing organic cultural currents, we can create social movements that do not depend on any one institution but are naturally self-reproducing. Ideally, they should be subversive while not immediately provoking repres-sion—it’s important that the lines be drawn, but participants must have enough time to go through an evolutionary process before the police break out their batons. A sustainable space that nurtures and grows from individual to collective, that contributes more to resilient movements than growing to it.

As much as punk has been dismissed as insular, the success of anarchist-punk demonstrates how effective it can be for anarchists to invest themselves in ongoing outreach to everyone, in ways that are not familiar with anarchist ideas, and at the same time never being too obvious about it. In reality, people at the centre of the punk scene, the collectives that nurture and consider anarchist punk. They published eleven issues between 1988 and 1992, when the last issue was put out with a 3000 print run.

And so the first arrival of punk anarchists arose in the late ‘80s. We know of ex-hippy anarchists, survivors of the Spanish Civil War of ‘36, as well as the publisher Antorcha, but there was no connection as a movement, just personal connections between hundreds of anarchist punks of similar ages, only a dozen or so had contacts with anarchists that weren’t punk. Conferences began to occur at the end of the ‘80s, at which punk and anarchist were discussed, and in the 90s anarchists from the journal Brigada Subversiva developed a strong bond with Omar and Chantal from Antorcha. An anarchist gathering in 1991 helped tighten the bonds between punks and non-punk anarchists.

So how strong are the connections between the punk scene and the anarchist movement in Mexico? In the 1980s when punk began in Mexico City, the music, the aesthetic, and the punk attitude—rejection of society, defiance of traditions, going against the opinions of others—dominated the scene. In reality, people were not familiar with anarchist ideas, and at first anarchist organizations, publications, and individuals did not exist. Of course, punk was full of references to anarchy, principally in the song “Anarchy in the UK” by the Sex Pistols, and so many believed that to be an anarchist was to become a punk, to live according to the slogan No Future, to die before turning twenty, and so on. So the way the first punks gravitated to anarchist ideas was through personal interest, and then slowly collectives and fanzines appeared with clearer ideas. This began with Punks Not Dead (PND), later the A-Collective. The 80s fanzine Carnials intro-duced references and information about anarchism, then the collective Contra Violencia and its eponymous fanzine offered Magonist and anarchist ideas with more clarity and coher-ence. Brigada Subversiva was the first zine to use “fanizm libertarian” (libertarian fanzine) as a subtitle; it functioned as a collective within a larger group called Colectivo Cambio Radial Fuerza Positiva CCRF (Positive Force for Radical Collective Change). The great majority of that group considered themselves anarchist punks. They published eleven issues between 1988 and 1992, when the last issue was put out with a 3000 print run.

And so the first arrival of punk anarchists arose in the late ‘80s. We know of ex-hippy anarchists, survivors of the Spanish Civil War of ‘36, as well as the publisher Antorcha, but there was no connection as a movement, just personal connections between hundreds of anarchist punks of similar ages, only a dozen or so had contacts with anarchists that weren’t punk. How strong are the connections between the punk scene and the anarchist movement in Mexico?

Punk in Mexico
The Bibliotheca Socialis Reconstructri

So how strong are the connections? The arri-val of punks to anarchist struggle signified the arrival of youth to the anarchist cause. If in the beginning there were only a handful of anarchist punks, in these days there are not less than 150 anarchist punks and more than a thousand with strong anarchist sympathies. Among 80 percent of the anarchists here are punks or have their roots in the punk movement; the remaining 20 percent are students, professors, some workers, and militants from an older time.

In your opinion, what potential is there in the Mexican punk scene for radicalization and political organization? What are the advantages and chal-lenges of the punk scene as a site for this...
In Mexico City, the appearance of anarchist ideas in the punk subculture heralded an influx of youth to the anarchist movement. Punk shows are a form of bonding for youth; they can reach between 200 and 1000 people, and are a place where we can spread anarchist ideas in pamphlets, zines, and other forms of propaganda. We make a point of booking anarchist bands, and also organize discussions on anarchist issues. At demonstrations the anarchist contingent consists of 95% punk. What are the disadvantages? Punk has its own problems: drugs, alcohol, and above all being a youth movement, from which people retire when they get married or reach 30. We lack a broad organization and common objectives.

What has been the role of individual punks and the punk counterculture in Mexican social conflicts, such as the revolt in Oaxaca in 2006, the struggle in San Salvador Atenco, and the ongoing conflict in Chiapas? Can you tell us more about other social conflicts we haven’t heard about in the US?

Many individuals and some collectives have participated in these conflicts. In Atenco, many compañeros participated in violent resistance; some were incarcerated and some compañeras participated in mobilizations against the World Bank and World Trade Organization. In Guadalajara in 2009, there was a meeting of European and Latin American economic interests, and more than 500 militants from various Mexican cities came together to protest. There was brutal repression directed principally towards the anarchist punk contingent, which resulted in hundreds of arrests; arrests were grouped by police, tortured, beaten unconscious, subjected to electrical shock, and threatened with death. Another ongoing fight has been the workers’ struggle against government company unions, in support of workers’ rights and self-organization. We’ve participated in and supported workers’ struggles at several different corporations and in a range of contexts. People who work with the Bibliotheca Social Reconstruir have had the satisfaction of seeing unions that had grown independent and have achieved better organizational forms; and, in workers in those unions have seen that people who support them are punks and anarchists.

In the US, punk is associated with younger generations rebelling against older ones—that is to say, punk generates a distance in culture, language, and values between younger and older people. How does this compare with punk culture in Mexico? Does punk culture generate a distance between anarchists and punk and past radical traditions? Or does it strengthen these same institutions?

Of course that division does exist—rebellious youth struggle against everything, including older people, and this has its advantages and disadvantages. As everyone knows, a movement without youth will grow old and die, and a movement with only youth will commit mistakes it could avoid. So the challenge is to combine the two struggles. In Mexico, the struggle is primarily made up of youth, but even so, with older folks as few as we are, it is still an advantage for us to be united by punk, and to find a closeness through this. We also share a connection with other anarchists who aren’t punks, and over the last few years there has been an interest in getting familiar with their form of participating in social transformation. There is a feeling among some that we have yet to surpass.

Does punk culture generate a distance in culture, language, and values between younger and older people. How does this compare with punk culture in Mexico? Does punk culture generate a distance between anarchists and punk and past radical traditions? Or does it strengthen these same institutions?

In Mexico we are few, but are integrated multi-generationally. Some musical groups include older folks, and in some collectives youth and older people live together, so that the generational division isn’t so visible. That is to say, we have fewer who consider themselves old. It is a taste for the music and the clothing; there is no emphasis on political consciousness, on entertainment and diversion. Punks, then, are seen as people who struggle to change the world through marches, publications, and organizing. There are other political youth currents, such as socialists and democrats. We have few contacts with them, for we have no affinity as movements. Marxists dedicate much of their energy to attacking and slandering anarchism, while anarchists endeavor to get close to the youth by pretending to be involved in struggle. The advantage that we have is that punk is still an intermediary through which to reach young people. Every now and then we spread propaganda in the schools and factories, as well. Being based in punk is also a disadvantage, in that we should be closer to other youth, workers, and students in order for the anarchist movement to extend itself further. The anarchist punk movement has lasted more than two decades since its inception, and in that time we have grown from the original handful of hundreds that we are now, but in terms of effectiveness, there are errors and mistakes that we have yet to surpass.

ABOUT THE BIBLIOTECA SOCIAL RECONSTRUIR

The Bibliotheca Social Reconstruir (roughly, library of social reconstruction) was founded over 25 years ago by a survivor of the Spanish Civil War named Ricardo Mestre Ventura. The Bibliotheca is located in downtown Mexico City, where it helps together Mexican libertarians for study groups, lectures, classes. The group is also active in encouraging this kind of self-education throughout the rest of Mexico. In the midst of the social conflict in San Salvador Atenco, for example, the Bibliotheca helped to start a libertarian community library. The Bibliotheca has played a role in a range of contexts, participated in mobilizations against the World Bank and World Trade Organization, and maintain an active collaboration with anarchist punk circles throughout the country. Part of this collaboration occurs through fundraising efforts; members have organized large benefit concerts with bands like Los Crudos, Sin Dios, Tragedy, Tragedia, Crimen de Guerra, and others. The Bibliotheca has been a longstanding component of the Mexican anarchist movement, but in its need of support with publishing, rent, and other costs. Readers who appreciate this interview might consider contributing donations to the Bibliotheca or to help with donations, email biblioteca@liberat.org.mx or biblioteca7@hot.com.
The Rebel Call
of Blackfire

Blackfire is a Native American punk rock band from Flagstaff, Arizona comprised of a sister and two brothers: Jeneda, Clayton, and Klee Benally. They were born into the heart of a political dispute on Black Mesa in the Dine’ (Navajo) Nation. Blackfire are everything a punk rock band should be. Each song is a call to action—they address government oppression, relocation of indigenous people, ecocide, genocide, domestic violence, and human rights—reflecting a deep commitment to resist injustice and build true community.

Blackfire has toured extensively throughout North America, Europe, and Africa. They have recorded with CJ and Joey Ramone, recorded with CJ and Joey Ramone, and have been carrying on the legacy of Black Mesa, Arizona on the Dine’ Reservation.

Many people have heard about the ongoing land and cultural survival struggles that our relatives are still facing. We grew up protesting a nearby coal mine called Peabody Coal that was depleting our precious aquifer. The coal slurry line also dripped the sole source of water in our high desert homeland.

Klee: Peabody Coal Company has been strip mining a large part of Black Mesa for decades. Our family has been directly impacted by “United States” policies of forced relocation that result from efforts to further exploit the resources beneath the land there. Many people have heard of the area referred to as Black Mesa, which is a larger area from which more than 14,000 of our people have been forcibly relocated and where some are still resisting. When we first started our band in 1989, our songs were about this issue. Our name, Blackfire, comes from the burning of the coal from Black Mesa; it also comes from one of our warrior society’s smoke signals, meaning “the enemy is near.”

You also perform as the Jones Benally Family; can you explain that as well?

Klee: We don’t want to answer to anyone but ourselves when it comes to the music we make. We hook our own tours, design our own album and website, produce our own videos, print our own shirts. When we can’t do it all or don’t have the time, we work with folks we know. This enables us, as artists, to express ourselves in the ways we want. This is in contrast to mainstream music production where bands become businesses that are controlled by large or small corporations. It’s no secret that the record industry is based on the exploitation of artists and listeners; that’s why we, like so many other groups out there, are trying something different. Some bands say, “We’re signing to a label to reach a wider audience with our political message.” I’ve yet to see that be effective on any tangible basis towards the social transformation that our communities really need. We’re not building community that way, we’re just building our own capabilities on the terms of an industry that’s still based on exploitation.

What is your motivation and goals as a band?

Clayson: Blackfire has always been a tool to address the issues that face our communities. When we started, our message was directed at our peers on the Navajo reservation. We could see the impact of assimilation—the degradation of our culture, the hopelessness that remains when all has been taken from you. By addressing the root causes of the symptoms that afflict us, we see our music as an element of the healing process. It’s not so much a goal, but a need! This is what keeps us moving forward.

Politically, how do you define yourselves as a band and as individuals?

Klee: I think each of us has our own self-identification. You could say a band as we are Dine’ traditionalists seeking balance in the contradictions of our times. We believe in the natural law and we are struggling to maintain our cultural identities in this modern world. In this way, politics define us. We actively stand against the destruction of Mother Earth, racism, sexism and sexist oppression, homophobia, ageism, and fascism. We’ve been into what is effective towards those goals; sometimes we’ll urge people to vote and support a Democratic candidate for Congress, other times we will be organizing or demonstrating and registering any perceived authority established by the so-called United States. Current political labels don’t encompass our traditional views—some may say we act more like anarchists.

Clayson: Dine’ translates to “the people.” This is who I am and how I relate to the world. Many people have lost their identity, and that is why they have an expendable role in the development of punk music, which is so related to the rest of the world and its indigenous inhabitants. Only seeing differences in a fear-based society can lead to the dangers of intolerance.

How have your family and larger community shaped your politics and worldview?

Klee: When you grow up seeing your family members face forced relocation, arrests, constant racism, health effects from uranium mining, and so on, you don’t have many options. We were practically raised at meetings and protests, but we were also raised traditionally. Our father is a traditional medicine practitioner, so we’ve grown up with that as our foundation as well. Hoozah! or the Beauty Way, is the basis of our identity as Dine’. This would take too much time to explain, but ultimately it establishes your relation to all life and Mother Earth.

Do you believe punk music and the punk subculture can be a force for change?

Clayson: I think a band can be a force for change. What roles have you seen punk music and subculture play in social movements in the US over the last ten years?

Clayson: Joey Ramone, the godfather of punk, once told me that the Sex Pistols cast a negative image on the ideals of punk. He felt that the energy of punk was something that everyone could relate to and that it was a liberating process in the evolution of music. I’ve seen punk in its purest form when it’s confronting oppressive systems in communities throughout the world. But here in the states punk has been devalued to nothing more than another way to sell a product.

Klee: The inevitable commercialization of punk has come and gone and come and gone again, but the anarcho-punk scene seems to have really defined itself as more actively oriented.

It’s getting hotter, harder to breathe, why should I calm down, I know I’ve been deceived like oceans of regret, all these questions rise will they drown with our mistakes or will they learn to fly?
As far as their role in social movements, I can only speak to my experience as an Indigenous organizer, and their role has yet to be seen. We see a lot of attention given to direct action and anti-globalization actions but not really to our Indigenous struggles. While we’re organizing our communities to protect the environment and our cultural survival, we don’t see much support unless there’s some “exciting” action element. I feel that the way some folks celebrate and promote the “exciting” actions undermines the constant hard work that needs to happen to sustain movements to build healthy communities. It’s the same anywhere; lots of people show up for the party, and a few are left doing all the work. Sure we need to celebrate, but we need to sustain as well.

During the 2008 presidential campaign, did you address the subject of the elections when you performed? What are some of your thoughts on the 2008 election in general and specifically what do you think about the election of Barack Obama?

Klee: We organized in the Dine’ (Navajo) Nation a lot around the 2004 elections. We did two outreach tours, one for registering people to vote and one to remind people to get to the polls. We also did a short documentary on our reservation addressing voter apathy. We were trying to communicate that when we are being negatively impacted by political decisions, we have an imperative to find out how we can affect those decisions. We didn’t really do any outreach for this election, I think mainly because we were touring Europe and wanted to put more energy and resources into organizing around issues in our community. Sure, voting is validating the system that is oppressing us, but until someone can step forward and offer another tool to give some relief from the energy policies that target our lands, I’m going to do pretty much whatever I can. The 2008 elections were an absurd political circus that displayed how ignorant the mainstream media is about racial and gender issues, and the most costly exercise of social control parading as democracy in US history. For that reason, I chose to abstain from voting in this election.

Obama is another political tool of a nation where racism is systemic. Of course it is historic to have a Black man sit in an office that was designed and reserved for white men. If Obama getting into office will be a means to deconstructing white privilege, than I’m all for it, but I don’t think that’s going to be the case—he may just be a tool to validate it. While I think the image of a Black man in the White House could demonstrate the transformation this country needs, it’s hard to say that it’s as meaningful as it could be in relation to matters of abolishing white privilege. The power structure that is screwing us over will now have a Black face instead of a white one; it complicates matters a bit but doesn’t change the situation.

Describe the social movements you’ve observed in the course of your travels.

Klee: Everywhere we go we connect with inspiring individuals or communities that are taking action. In Mali, Africa our friends in the Tuareg band Tinariwen started their group within a rebellion. We went to their land twice and saw how the US military is attempting to move into their lands to secure access to natural resources. Today, Tuareg people are being killed in Mali and other areas due to efforts to mine uranium in their lands. In Europe, the anarchist scenes comprise a movement defined by resistance to corporate globalization. It appears similar to the dynamics in the US, where folks will rage against the G8, WTO, IMF, or World Bank in force, seeming to be more present for protest than sustaining a process of organized resistance. It was very interesting playing in Belgrade, Serbia; we actually played there twice, but the first time everyone we knew said, “Don’t go there; they’re all just neo-Nazis.” But when we went and played it was powerful. Folks were sharing stories of how they creatively organized against Milosovich and faced severe punishment for it. They talked about how they would throw parties on rooftops while NATO was bombing them ‘cause they were tired of living in fear. In Mexico we’ve been encouraged by the visibility of Indigenous people’s resistance and meaningful support for their struggles for self-determination. I think that non-Indigenous folks there have a better sense of how Indigenous people’s resistances are related to their own personal struggles as well. No matter where we go, though, we see the increased criminalization of dissent.

Jeneda and Clayson, both of you recently had children, and you now travel with them—has this affected or changed your experience of touring and playing in a band?

Jeneda: I feel like I could write a book on this topic. I love being able to share my work with my daughter. I am so blessed that she also enjoys the adventure life. Since becoming a mother my entire being is enriched with compassion, patience, and absolute love. Of course, when children grow up with a particular lifestyle, like touring, they learn to be adaptable. My daughter has rock and roll hours and enjoys sleeping in. She is not yet school age, so we will see how it all changes when she’s older.

Clayson: I also have a baby girl, and of course she travels with us when she can. It’s the best way to experience life. I grew up on the road sharing and learning. This is one of the best educations that life offers.

Talk about the work you do outside of the band: what are some of your other projects?

Klee: We all are part of the Save the Peaks Coalition which was formed to stop a small ski business from desecrating an Arizona mountain held holy by more than 13 Indigenous Nations. I founded and am a coordinator for a non-profit media justice group called Indigenous Action Media which produces documentaries on Indigenous issues and does consultation and support for grassroots campaigns in Indigenous communities, including graphic design and website development for Indigenous organizations. We also have a project called Outta Your Backpocket Media where we hold workshops and empower young people to make their own media. I also helped establish and now volunteer with Taala Hooghian, an Indigenous-established/oriented info-shop and youth media arts center in Flagstaff, Arizona.

What is “Peak’s Song” about?

Jeneda: “Peak’s Song” is about protecting the holy San Francisco Peaks. The San Francisco Peaks are located in Northern Arizona and are holy to 13 Tribes and culturally significant to 22 Tribes. This holy place is managed by the Forest Service, which presently leases a portion of the mountain to a ski resort. This ski resort want to make snow out of reclaimed wastewater. Not only would this be an environmental catastrophe in the making, it would also be an extreme desecration to our holy place, an act of cultural genocide.

Klee: Right now the Save the Peaks Coalition is awaiting a decision by the Supreme Court on whether it will hear the case or not. Whether the Court will hear the case and do the right thing is uncertain, especially considering history. While we are forced to take our fight to the courts, we also urge everyone to join us wherever they can in the struggle for self-determination and the protection of our Mother Earth.

The song ends with a chant, “Protect Sacred Sites, Defend Human Rights” and mentions many different land struggles through out the United States.

Jeneda: Hopefully people will recognize that a mountain or natural place can be just as holy as a Catholic or Christian church. I hope people will remember that there were and still are civilizations that hold natural places holy—that we are still practicing our ancient ways and we need these places intact to continue these ancient living practices that are essential to cultural survival.

Klee: Wherever there is an environmental crisis, there is a cultural crisis, because we are part of the earth. We don’t have guaranteed protection for our religious freedom in the US as Indigenous peoples. Hundreds of sacred sites are either being desecrated or face the threat of desecration right now and we have no legal mechanism to stop this. The struggle to protect these sacred places is the struggle for our cultural survival.

At first what effect do you hope to have on those that hear your songs?

Jeneda: I hope that people become inspired not only to understand their connections to these struggles, but also understand their own

Broadcast Live is a fiery, passionate political band combining deep rhythm with spoken word and powerful vocals to create a unique sound. They just finished recording an album and we are planning a huge nationwide tour; they are Victorio, Seantel, Gaetaos, and Joey Leanza-Carey. We interviewed Joey.

How would you describe your sound?
We play a mix of hip hop, indie rock, and spoken word. Musically, we all come from different places and listen to a wide range of music. Our collective playlist right now would probably consist of hip hop, some indie rock, some electro-dance (la LA CSS or ESG), some old-school soul, and Latin music. I’ve been obsessed with Sam Cooke—and lots of 60s power ballads.
We’ve also had the privilege of working with a lot of great radical musicians who are an ever-increasing influence. In particular, Son of Nun, Taina Asili, and Evan Greer.
How would you describe yourselves politically?
We don’t have a uniform political identity. We’re all dedicated to deconstructing all forms of hierarchy and oppression. The foundations of our belief systems are pretty much the same; it’s only in the smallest details that you’ll find differences. I, myself, am an unapologetic anarchist.
What kinds of different venues/social spaces have you found yourselves playing?
All of my favorite shows have been at activist/community spaces. On our last tour we played this Chicano art space in Berkeley, CA. The police showed up right before we got on, and somehow the organizers managed to get ten minutes of performance time out of them. So we only got to play two songs, but the room was electric.
Playing cafes is interesting because everyone is usually very enthusiastic, but college shows involve contracts and lots of money and other restrictions. They’re usually fun, but sometimes it feels more like a “real job”—a sold out labor situation. But the money we get from those shows enables us to play spaces like infoshops for next to nothing.
Compare some of your experiences with punk and hip hop subcultures and their potential for revolutionary change.
That’s an interesting question. Both of these cultures are almost inherently rebellious by

Is there anything else you would like to add, in closing?

Klee: Solidarity Means Action.
Jeneda: If you see injustice in your community, speak out about it. Do what you can in what time you have to create healthy and respectful communities. Remember that we all have the power to make a difference in the world and in people’s lives with the decisions that we make and the actions that we take.

A Cross (Sub)Cultural Mix: Broadcast Live

That’s something very difficult to achieve in the short term. The way our society and economy is constructed forces you to participate in it, even if you oppose it. Some would say that you can remove yourself from it, but there are a few problems with that. First is the issue of community responsibility. We could all run off and live in insular “revolutionary communities” but would effectively end any solidarity with others’ struggles. The second issue is a cultural one. I’ve never quite felt a true part of this larger American anarchist scene. Sometimes it’s frustrating that the ideology is associated with a particular set of cultural indicators. I believe that we can deconstruct forms of racism, patriarchy, et cetera, and still have a genuinely multicultural world.

How has your music intersected with the political projects you’re a part of?
Our music is all political, and we’re all involved in various forms of activism, but I’m not sure how to take it to the next level. We’re involved with the Albynn Political Prisoner Support Committee, so we’ve done a lot concerning political prisoners and prison abolition. I’ve also been talking a lot with Evan Greer, of RiotFolk, about setting up a network of radical musicians to provide resources and material support to various grassroots struggles.
I think that’s the best way that the music—I hope it—can facilitate real change.

Small Town Organizing for Anarchists

If you live, or have lived, in a small town* in the US and have spent any of that time trying to get a project off the ground, you’re already familiar with the obstacles small town radicals face. If, in addition, you’ve ever turned to radicals in much larger cities with much larger projects under their belts, hoping for guidance and inspiration, you will know how disillusioning it can be. Most contemporary anarchist organizing has been defined by radical projects coming out of larger metropolitan areas: Food Not Bombs projects to feed the homeless and hungry, math bookstores and collective spaces with dozens of members and volunteers, theoretical debates about the nature of European anarchists. These projects are unthinkably or irrelevant in the small towns where many of us live.

The most important step is always the first. If you decide to move forward quickly, you need to establish a working group of committed comrades. This is a delicate matter—make sure your friends understand that you’re ready to commit to sticking around and working through the hard stuff when things get difficult, but don’t twist anyone’s arm. If you’re all on the same page you’ll all benefit from having companions equally willing to invest time and energy, by the same token, you can’t count on a group of people you’ve managed to talk into your wild ideas if they don’t really share your drive and desire. It’s better to work closely with those with whom you have the greatest affinity than to be always making plans for others who may not come through! Likewise, though there will be plenty of situations in which it will be beneficial if someone “bottomlines” a task, take the time to maintain a horizontal social structure for the big picture plans. Be careful to work with friends who are equally committed to this. If you don’t have anyone—if there is no one you can collaborate with to create anarchist space and sentiment where you live—you can still make amazing things happen. Be outgoing and adventurous, stay committed, and keep your eyes open: an active anarchist is only lonely for a short time!

Once you have a sturdy working group, ask yourselves some core questions. Who is stuck in your town? Who lives there by choice? Who feels relatively alone? Which of you belongs to yourselves some core questions. Who is stuck in your town; about 30,000 people in your area on your fingers, our advice is easily relevant.

For a Healthy Working Group:
Don’t project responsibilities onto your friends
Do remind your companions that their company is important and wonderful Don’t take on projects that require more hands than your group has; don’t count on volunteers miraculously appearing
Do bear in mind what other groups can offer your projects
Do let your friends know what you need to stay in the game
Do check in frequently to see what is changing Don’t let your friends down! A thousand times no!

The most important thing for your group of friends to do is to know each other as well so you can anticipate each other’s needs and trust each other to communicate. Welcome others into your group whenever it makes sense. Don’t be so eager to get helping hands that you jeopardize your safety or the success of your plans, but don’t exclude others for lack of experience alone. Without a doubt, your small town circle will be connected to at least a few other groups and social circles. Perhaps the local Catholic Workers share some of your goals and interests? Maybe there is a college in your town and you know members of student groups with connections to resources or potential volunteers? Are there burnt out activists, or anyone for that matter, who might be sympathetic? Make note of all of these groups and decide whether or not to invest energy in any connections you might have with them.

Sketch out some short-, medium-, and long-term goals. If everything went smoothly, where would you like to be in a year? How about in five? Let your fantasies run wild—just keep in mind that you’ll have to commit to all the incremental steps that can enable you to realize them. A good timeline should consist of projects that are rewarding in themselves while establishing the conditions in which more will be possible.

At the start of the end timeline. What is the best thing out on the horizon—where are you headed? What will it take to get there? May be you’d like to be able to organize unpermitted Reclaim the Streets parties in your town. That would require a fair bit of momentum for most small communities—not to mention an analysis of how public space is used and what the role of the authorities is in such situations, at least among the few dozen people it would take to pull it off. If these are among your long-term goals, you could plan to author and distribute literature that calls attention to issues around public space. You’ll also need the logistical skills and resources to make a Reclaim the Streets party happen, that might mean planning safer block parties, parades, or Really Really Free Markets first. In order to get these preliminaries projects off the ground, you might need a reputation for throwing great parties, which you could acquire by hosting exciting events in your home. The trick is to understand how to outshine all previous events.

In building a community, the most important aspect of outreach is maintaining points of entry: without accessible activities, your group will not be able to maintain these as well so you can anticipate each other’s needs and trust each other to communicate. Welcome others into your group whenever it makes sense. Don’t be so eager to get helping hands that you jeopardize your safety or the success of your plans, but don’t exclude others for lack of experience alone. Without a doubt, your small town circle will be connected to at least a few other groups and social circles. Perhaps the local Catholic Workers share some of your goals and interests? Distributing literature isn’t what it used to be; thanks to blogs, MySpace, internet forums, and www.infoshop.org, information travels quickly through the anarchist community. Lots of material can be read online—which drains the magic and intimacy from such readings. But you can’t depend on the internet to accomplish all of your outreach tasks, so start a zine.

Offering tangible and relevant literature at strategic times and public events is an invaluable tool. Pose as a student group at campus club fairs and distribute relevant radical literature. Store-wildcatting recipes and anti-capitalist tracts with local wilderness anarchists. Plan games like Capture the flag for high-school students and other explorers. Host themed parties in your home to challenge all attendees to do something unfamiliar and absurd. Bond with non-heteronormative neighbors and others out on the margins challenging patriarchy. Outreach is all about imagination: how will you meet people and share exciting experiences with them?

practice for any budding radical community.

Find a connection to free or cheap printing: investigate campuses, explore your options at copy shops, or look for a used photocopier. Stock up for different occasions and crowds, and read everything you plan to distribute so you’ll be prepared to discuss any of it.

When a small group of anarchists is engaged in aboveground organizing, they might be singled out as the culprits of any underground trouble. Be clear in mind and don’t put yourselves needlessly at risk by leaving dots that are too easy to connect. At the same time, your public presence shouldn’t deter others from taking action; just as you shouldn’t do things that jeopardize others, try not to police others who share your values.

In some cases, local anarchist organizers can maintain a clandestine alter ego group that acts anonymously when a riskier or more militant approach is called for.

Demoralizing, but in small towns it’s often better to maintain an unmediated relationship with these people than to rely on second-hand gossip to present you in the best light. It is up to your working group to decide where to draw the line. At the same time, you will likely find other groups you genuinely respect and wish to support.

Your small group can’t singlehandedly take advantage of every opportunity in your town. The larger your radical community is, the more diverse ideas and initiatives you can expect to produce. One way to expand your community is to draw from other communities. Like it or not, not every anarchist will be committed to his or her hometown. The social tides are constantly changing, bear in mind that they might be especially sensitive about your contrasting perspectives. You don’t have to compromise your ethics or tactics to work well with others, but don’t be insensitive.

Be intentional about your relationships with others. Be clear about who you are openly opposing: for example, some local government, all law enforcement, the owners of certain businesses, known unrepentant abusers. Likewise, give thought to whom allies you are seeking. You might make gestures of goodwill to certain people simply for strategic purposes: the city inspector, for example. This can be Touring projects take note: small towns can be worth visiting! Schedule a good number of small towns into any tour for less driving, less stress, and a responsive, attentive turnout.

Situations are the best form of outreach; people will come with their experiences. Anarchism, rather than with their intelligence, but inform them about boundaries they should respect.

Many other activities mentioned in this field guide, it would take another entire recipe to discuss all the details of managing a collective space. But if you're in it for the long haul, all this work will be worth it! Think of the momentum you could sustain with a permanent greenhouse in which to incubate projects and relationships. You'll likely inspire others to take risks to acquire more spaces themselves, if they can count on your space to be there for years.

How will you use the space to provide for your community? You might offer some kind of infrastructure: a reliable large-serving kitchen, a point of distribution for radical literature, a bike basement? A collective house? An infoshop? A squat? A woodland compound?

The success of your progress toward long-term goals may well depend on the establishment of permanent anarchist spaces and institutions. Think this over in advance. What is a realistic space for your group to manage? A garden? A book exchange? A collective house? An infoshop? A squat? A woodland compound?

Though opening such a space might seem to some like aardi st project, you may have to do so to maintain your emotional health. Be aware of when your cohorts are struggling, and do your best to support them. Don't press to do so to maintain your emotional health.

We can measure our strength by the prevalence and scope of permanent anarchist spaces; how frequently they are established, how consistently, communally, and joyfully they are maintained, and how fiercely they are defended.

Finally, make sure whatever space you're establishing is important enough to your group that you can all commit yourselves to defending it—that means protecting it with good security culture when applicable, maintaining healthy public relations, taking calculated risks when necessary, and above all coming through on your commitments month after month and year after year. Don't go through the trouble to establish a space that feels like an unwarranting burden—if you don't enjoy your volunteer shift enough to look forward to it, it's probably not going to last!

We have to continuously, consensually, and joyfully organize the radical culture when applicable, maintaining healthy public relations, taking calculated risks when necessary, and above all coming through on your commitments month after month and year after year. Don't go through the trouble to establish a space that feels like an unwarranting burden—if you don't enjoy your volunteer shift enough to look forward to it, it's probably not going to last!

WINONA
Making of a Scene Report

Winona is a magical place, concealed from the outside world by the unglaciated geography of the Mississippi River Valley.
Prehistory: Where We Started

Setting the Stage

Winona is a small town of 30,000 in the south-east corner of Minnesota, almost an hour north of the Iowa border and separated from Wisconsin by the Mississippi River. If you were on your way to Minneapolis from Chicago, or passing across the Midwest on Interstate 90, you might stop in Winona to take a break in the lush, prehistoric river valley. There aren’t any skyscrapers or music clubs, or much in the way of public transit or fancy restaurants; the pace of living is slow and steady. There is a state university, a private college, and a vocational school, but Winona isn’t a college town per se. Winona began as one of the larger European prairie settlements during the area’s colonization. Because of its position on the river, where freight trains from the north unload their cargo onto barges, it became a booming industrial town,��的天外来客...

Summer of 2006, our small circle hosted the anarchists. It was our first real group project, and could easily be considered the formative endeavor for us. The convergence prepara-to each other and future projects. Planning such a gathering proved an incredibly useful exercise—for

The Social Obstacle of Substance Use
Like many scenes, Winona is troubled by alcoholism and drug use. The working-class roots of the town have made Winona a city of bars and churches, and twentysomethings are affected the most. With the town center a local young person’s atmosphere is totally shaped by drinking culture, with binge-drinking weekends completely transforming the downtown experience.

Though not everyone in our group identifies as straight edge, none of us are engaged by party culture, and we find that this creates social rifts between our working group and other anti-authoritarians. In the punk rock glory days, drinking may have been a central theme, but it held space side by side with fantastic events, free food savings, house shows and punk houses, conversations about radical politics, and so on. One by one, those themes have fallen out of view, while drinking remains the ever-available pasture of choice.

Navigating the unfortunate communication breakdowns between our working group and other local anti-authoritarians has been a real challenge. Recently, we’ve taken steps to rekindle bonds with weekly games of 4-square, at which participants can enjoy themselves with or without substances. Our success in Winona will depend considerably on our ability to come together to share projects and experiences with all anti-authoritarians without the divisive dynamics that often do thrive in diverse DIY communities.

"Secret Cafés are a small town must. The idea is to turn an ordinary (or extraordinary!) space into a temporary restaurant with sliding-scale food and entertainment. A much wider range of people may turn out to these than, say, a concert, and the social benefits can equal the financial ones. Turn your backyard into a Cajun Grill, or your living room into a vegan bakery and coffeehouse. Provide scandalously delectable treats to people who otherwise couldn’t afford them, and give the farmers and neighbors the opportunity to support radical projects instead of the service industry."
of this project—they showed up in full force to all the fundraisers and shared stories of hippie adventure from 1970s Winona. Fundraising also involved collecting clothes from local thrift store dumpsters and printing designs on them and making other merchandise to sell on tour. In addition, the group organized a “field trip” before removing the seating from the bus, taking people to a rural park to play games and eat sack lunches.

The bus crew was busy booking and promoting the tour stops, taking turns collecting and filtering vegetable oil, and converting the engine to run on it. Everything seemed to be coming along well: the dates were booked, the engine conversion was successful, and two brimming totes of screenprinted clothes were ready along with a rack of free literature, an emergency fund, and plenty of excitement about the tour.

Unfortunately, there were weaknesses in the organizational structure of the project. For example, beyond the music, there were no performance plans established. Nor was there a clear, consensual distribution of labor. These issues went unresolved even as the bus rolled out of Winona for its first act in faraway Oregon. When engine troubles developed, further challenges appeared in the internal dynamics of the group. In the end, the tour as promoted was cancelled after less than half a dozen performances, and the group returned home for a show, to recharge and divide. The bus later went on to reach the East Coast, traveling a total of 7000 miles without paying a dime of gas tax, and the music act hitchhiked a portion of the remaining tour.

Though not everything went according to plan, the tour taught important lessons. Committing to the project meant committing to work well together, not being afraid to ask for help, and always making sure someone is committing to doing everything that needs doing. By far the worst aspect of the outcome of the tour was the social fallout; our community still hasn’t completely recovered. There is a silver lining, though: we’re more conscious of our interactions with others and more aware of the importance of clear communication.
Bringing Small Town Strategy Into Play

Our efforts to create radical infrastructure and momentum in our hometown

Letterpress

In late spring 2006, members of our working group began to plan the first of our intentional projects for Winona: a design and printing firm to raise funds for future projects. We were inspired to try this following our experiences with printing and graphic design. To this end, we founded an entire letterpress studio essentially free for the hauling. After an intense moving scenario, we managed to acquire our Chandler & Price 8x12 Platen Press, two small hand presses, rollers, ink, 100 trays of moveable lead type, and all sorts of other letterpress essentials.

Two years in the making, Keona Artists’ Guild offers sliding-scale graphic design and letterpress printing. While most of our paid work involves fancy wedding invitations, we also print zine covers, our friends’ CD packaging, and other such rewarding jobs. Of course, it also provides a valuable resource for our other projects, and allows us to cover most of our living expenses by working occasionally from home.

Wild Nettle Distribution

Years ago, when we were in high school, a couple of us distributed radical media in Winona—we brought zines, music, books, patches, and other anarchist paraphernalia to punk shows, and this sparked our interest in networking with the broader anarchist community. We experimented with screenprinting and making zines, and designed our first website; we would experiment with screenprinting and making merchandise that remained after the cancellation of the aforementioned tour, we dusted off the leftovers of the distribution we did in high school and Wild Nettle Distribution was born.

We bought a photocopier for $25 and located other printers on the local campuses, and our free zine selection grew and grew. We've sold CrimethInc. books, other anarchist publications and projects, shirts and patches, and given away countless free stencils, posters, and advice to the idealistic youth and middle-aged dropouts of Winona. Lately, we’ve been setting up at legitimate events outside the anti-authoritarian community, we’ve been enthusiastically accepted there, despite the extreme sentiment of most of our literature. We’ve also taken Wild Nettle Distro on tour to the East Coast and back and to various regional anarchist events.

Long Weekend

Our first project as a working group was to initiate our long-term strategy with a three-day festival dubbed “Long Weekend: Neighborly Discussion for a Free Winona.” Our ulterior motive was to determine whether or not there might be community support for a free newspaper. We also wanted to create an intimate town meeting atmosphere in which people could talk candidly about mutual aid in Winona. The three of us brainstormed, contacted friends, and prepared a schedule of exciting events. We compiled this information and a manifesto about gift economics and mutual aid into a program and distributed it everywhere: on mailboxes, on doorsteps, directly into people’s hands. Soon, the little booklets had infiltrated conversations all around town. The weekend opened with a potluck in the basement of the Winona Arts Center. As people were finishing their meals, a scripted dialogue was heard above the conversation and the room quieted to listen to the words from the program text: “The gift economy means presents for everyone. It is how information travels through our community. How we feed ourselves. It is a warm meal on a cold night . . .”

In the course of the weekend we showed a few films and held a number of conversations about subjects specific to Winona. A critical occasional members of the community gather for a Critical Mass ride. These events draw a cross section of our town’s DIY community.

† Editor's note: In our experience, it has almost never worked out for the host when small DIY groups buy their own photocopier—a task always ends up costing much more for supplies and repairs. Until we can raise the entirety of the means of production, it is often more sensible to steal what we need from our exploiters and make them pay the maintenance fees. The authors of this report insist that they bought a photocopier and enough toner to make more than 10,000 copies for $25, and this may indicate that with the advent of the internet there are new opportunities—for nothing beats good old-fashioned theft.

That’s a lot of rain. Fortunately, printing is an indoor activity.
discussion on the rise and fall of Food Not Bombs resulted in a series of monthly potlucks and planted seeds for a possible Really Really Free Market. There was a DDBC panel at which five members talked about their experiences and entertained questions.* During a discussion of electoral politics and their role in small town local organizing, people weighed in from very different social circles and perspectives. Many people threw around ideas for a community newspaper. Only two months later, a free monthly newspaper appeared featuring an article detailing all that went on during the event. This provided a solid point of reference for the establishment of intentional mutual aid networks and won us many people’s support.

Newspaper

Shortly after the “Long Weekend,” we began publishing a monthly newspaper about mutual aid called Free Winona. We wanted a newspaper that would connect different social circles and invest this interconnection with a broad sense of community self-determination. Our goal was to promote conversation about ongoing adventures in gift economics by analyzing different projects in our community.

Starting the newspaper with a small affinity group was a wise choice: we were able to create exactly what we wanted, balance the workload according to a consensus process, and lay the groundwork for bigger plans in terms of ideas and rhetoric.† Focusing on a specific theme in each issue enables us to connect the newspaper to the other projects we are working on and use it as a supplement to our other efforts.

By our fifth issue, we were prepared to open the editorial collective to other people. We began having formal meetings and before long we’d doubled our work power. As of this writing, we’ve just celebrated our one year anniversary.

* One example of the usefulness of such discussions in small towns is that when the bike club expressed that they’d had a difficult time spreading the word, one member of the audience stood up and offered to provide advertising in the grocery cooperative’s newsletter.

† With the basics covered in our newspaper, we can be confident that the anarchist principles referenced in the zines we distribute and the character of our festivals won’t be lost on the “masses.”
to our work with the newspaper, we already had connections to various social groups interested in demonstrating mutual aid in action.

We asked some of the town’s charitable organizations to help distribute fliers—an ironic venue through which to promote self-determination and mutual aid rather than guilt-induced charity—and initiated a rigorous promotional campaign with posters and radio call-ins. The DDBC pitched in to raise kids’ bikes for free. Our local puppeteer planned something different for each ‘Free Market: he gave away free tacos from his taco bike, hosted a talent show, performed with his puppets. A few volunteers from the Catholic Worker group brought surplus supplies of soap, shampoo, and toothbrushes. Community Harvest, a local revision of Food Not Bombs, served hot meals made with reclaimed food.

The event has been advertised in the mainstream newspapers as a free yard sale one month, and a block party the next; this ambiguity has kept it populated with all the best sports in town. It has been heartening to see participants come back month after month with a greater sense of how they’d like to participate.

Regional Networks

It was becoming apparent that we had a lot to offer to and a lot to learn from anarchists in neighboring towns and cities. We began making ties with kids in the cities around us: Des Moines, IA, the Twin Cities of MN, Milwaukee and Madison, WI. We met a lot of new friends at convergences and consultas including gatherings preparing for the Republican National Convention, various Crime-ThInc. convergences, and other regional events. We met kids from small towns like ours—Brainerd, MN, Bemidji, MN, and Oshkosh, WI. Comparing notes really paid off in our local organizing, and discussing small town dynamics with others from the region has helped us form a loose network of anarchist communities in the upper Midwest.

We shared our observations formally at the Milwaukee CrimethInc. convergence, and informally elsewhere; one of us went on a tour the summer of 2008, visiting small towns with the literature distro and a musical act. We’re interested in visiting communities within a reasonable traveling distance from Winona to share the lessons we’ve learned and learn new ones—see our contact information below to get in touch.

DDBC Bicycle Co-op

In spring of 2008 the bike club signed their first storefront lease downtown—a substantial change from the punk house backyards from whence they’d come. Let’s back up to 2003, when the bike club got its start. Castle Greyskull, one of the few punk houses at the time, was a swarming hub of activity: there were always people working on bikes, sharing tools, and teaching each other about bicycle maintenance. Immediately thereafter, the Far East House hosted an era of ambitious freak bikes. In these formative years, the Bike Club learned to roll together as a group and developed an understanding of what they wanted for Winona. Meanwhile, the bikes kept accumulating. The club hoped to start a free bike program, and began distributing free red and black bicycles and racks.

Eventually, city inspectors complained about the bicycles in the yard, and it was clear that the group needed a permanent space. The DDBC worked to receive state non-profit status, found a grant with the help of the Miss Rockaway Armada, and located a home for the project: the basement of a nearby thrift store. It wasn’t a space that invited foot traffic, but it was a step in the right direction.

While the basement lease lasted, the club searched for other spaces. Finally, a space became available in arguably the most beautiful historic downtown storefront. Our working group and other members of the DIY community showed up for some solidarity work, hauling bikes and helping prepare the new space for the club.

So it was that in 2008 the DDBC Bicycle Co-op launched several new programs: bike maintenance workshops, free bike rentals, a cheap bike parts thrift store, and a space offering tools for fixing and building bicycles. No bicycle has ever been sold by the DDBC, and over 100 have been given away since the space opened.

‘Free Markets

Regular Really Really Free Markets began in April 2008. We held two open group meetings weeks before the first one to determine the loose organizational tasks that needed covering—things like publicity, food, and cleanup duties. Thanks to our work with the newspaper, we already had connections to various social groups interested in demonstrating mutual aid in action.

We asked some of the town’s charitable organizations to help distribute fliers—an ironic venue through which to promote self-determination and mutual aid rather than guilt-induced charity—and initiated a rigorous promotional campaign with posters and radio call-ins. epilogue

Our working group spent its first year living apart, with no real common space to operate from. We had talked about renting a house—even two—but had really wanted to buy a property to get the most out of our long-term investments. After months of searching for the right fixer-upper, we received an offer we couldn’t refuse: a contract for deed with no banks involved on a large, decrepit duplex—from anarchist sympathizers,* no less!

This means great things for us: we will now have storage space for our Free Market supplies and leftovers, meeting space for our newspaper, a radical library for the DIY community, a permanent home for our printing equipment† and literature distribution, and room enough to host visiting travelers.

Committing to live together has meant a new intermediate step for our group—learning how every aspect of our lives can transform a world of defeat into an arena hush for triumph. We have a new face for public relations: an embassy of sorts for the anarchist communities of the Midwest to visit, and an ambassador’s office through which we hope to interact more with locals. Our next great challenge will be to overcome the disparities within our local anti-authoritarian scene, and to work with others to nurture an anarchist community on the verge of eruption.

* “We like what you’re doing here. To be honest, we’re betting anarchists will be more dependable than the economy, so let’s cut a deal.”
† Ironically, because we now own a home and the means of production, we officially qualify as petite bourgeois, according to ancient scripture.

Our most recent and demanding project: restoring a dilapidated duplex to serve as a hub for our projects and a growing regional network.

Our region put a lot of effort into facilitating resistance to the Republican National Convention in September 2008. Participating in that work helped solidify Winona’s place in a network of anarchist communities, and we were happy to contribute time and energy to the grunt work. May the networks we build last generations.

Bringing the Storm to St. Paul
As the RNC approached, a seething hurricane named “Gustav” (German for “staff of God”) with winds of 155 miles per hour took aim at my little house on the levee.

A couple days later, having agreed to form part of the support element for a lockdown blockade, we found a secluded spot near the intersection and waited for word that deleges were on their way. As soon as the text message came in, we pulled up our bandannas and dashed from our hiding place toward the blockade site, creating a few improvised roadblocks along the way. At the site, eight people locked themselves together in a circle with “sleeping dragons,” and a black bloc of around three dozen more formed a protective buffer and built a secondary blockade by moving large metal benches into the street and locking them together. We took control of the major thoroughfare for over two hours, forcing an official closure of the road of ordinary people.

Once the lockdown was established, the bloc, already an island, formed an impenetrable wall, still singing. At that moment, the hurricane sound system blared electronic music and a handful of energetic young people danced—fully masked—in the center of the group. Masking up too early has doomed breakaway marches in the past, but in this case it only seemed to attract more infiltrators. Masking ahead of time, however, did not seem to affect the otro’s ability to recognize him. The detainee was plucked from the prone officer’s grasp, who seemed too slow for the job, and rubber bullets. The next three hours were a game of cat and mouse. We resisted intersection attacks and random traffic, and our interactions with the police were generally verbatim assaults.

As random other crews joined us, our numbers swelled. At one point, we held an intersection for nearly twenty minutes because MSNBC, CNN, and dozens of other media outlets had swarmed into it with us. The impromptu press conference allowed us to state our objections to militarism and war and articulate our support for the peace movement’s vision of the peaceful world we wanted to see, and briefly discouraged the cops from kicking the crap out of us. The police were almost as hostile towards the media as they were to us, but for a moment they limited themselves to verbal assaults.

Eventually we moved down to Kellogg Boulevard, due East of the Xcel Center, where one of the six “Loading Zones” for the Republican delegates was located. A squad of bicycle cops, clearly regarded as the police, had formed a protective chain in front of the Xcel Center, and immediately swarmed into the crowd and threw a hockey-style body check, sending the officer flying awkwardly to the ground. Still grasping the collar of his would-be arrestee, the officer fired an arc of pepper spray, mostly hitting the misdirections of the individual in front of him. The detainee was packed from the prone officer’s grasp, who seemed too shocked to resist. The crowd cheered and the officer retreated to his car.

We fall back slowly, medics rushing to attend to the injured and get them out of harm’s way. Everything that isn’t bolted down is dragged into the street; the sound of scraping metal mingles with the explosions of concussion grenades and tear gas canisters.

and rerouting of candidate buses. For the first time that day, but certainly not the last, I was overwhelmed by the bravery and determination of ordinary people.

of the delegate buses. Ten of our members were sprayed in the face with pepper spray and two were violently thrown to the ground by police officers; one cop on a motorcycle drove right into our crew and hit a person, who suffered minor injuries. Two of our members were arrested with misdemeanor charges and later released.

Up the street, a Funk the War contingent of about 500 black-clad anarchists were having a dance party in the intersection of Kellogg and Wabasha. Police fired tear gas into the crowd, and also rubber bullets and concussion grenades. Anarchists attempted to slow the police line by dragging newspaper bins, traffic signs, dumpsters, and sandbags into the streets. Skirrmishes between protesters and police were widespread by 4 p.m., and downtown St. Paul was clearly in the middle of a riot.

Bullfighting in the Twin Cities

“This is your third and final warning. This is your third and final warning. “This is your third and final warning. “This is your third and final warning. “This is your third and final warning. This is your third and final warning.” It’s hard to make out the voice from the megaphone in the midst of all the noise and confusion; there must be a couple hundred of us now. . . . order you to disperse, or you will be subject to—” Yeah, I know, I think to myself, or we will be subject to arrest—but he surprises me. —chemical weapons. Chemical weapons! My heart soars. We’re in front of one of the most prestigious delegate hotels—if they gas us here, they’re practically admitting defeat! I haven’t been tear-gassed since Quebec City, and I have such fond memories of gas-masked anarchists throwing back the smoking canisters. Too bad I’m not really dressed for it.

Whose streets?” I yell, hoarse but enthusiastic. “OUR STREETS!” everyone answers, making good on it by holding their ground as the first shots ring out. As clichéd as it sounds, I could do this all day. It beats gnawing my nerves in private rage, wishing for a chance to engage with the murderers who are destroying the planet.

On reflection, it’s not surprising that they’re trying to force us back—on an open park to our left, there’s no way they could surround us. They need to get us onto terrain they can control.

We fall back slowly, medics rushing to attend to the injured and get them out of harm’s way. Turning a corner, we come upon a wagon pulled by horses. The city around us is suddenly eerily empty. We walk arm in arm, letting our breathing slow. As fast as their orders go out, our legs keep moving. As fast as our orders are, our legs are always faster. It can be frightening to run right through forming lines of police, but riot police are extremely predictable if you can tell what their orders are. At one point I practically crash into one officer, but as his task is to block the way rather than to make individual arrests, he doesn’t react.

No friendly faces in sight, and delegate buses at the end of the block with accompanying militia. The reality is setting in that we are alone and in danger. Luckily, we find an alley and duck into it before our pursuers can make the previous turn.

The video cut again to show a single teenager sitting cross-legged and completely alone in the middle of an intersection downtown, calmly beating out a feeble-sounding rhythm with a small jingle-bell stick, surrounded by a large circle of imposing but confused-looking riot police. The reporter managed to get into the circle of police to interview Keith, who simply said “Well, I just wanted to come up here and show them that they can’t get away with whatever they want.”

The video dragged on as Keith continued sitting in the intersection, lightly shaking his jingle-bell stick amidst the otherwise silent stone-faced gazes from the police, having obviously been there quite a while. We watched with wide eyes at the gall Keith had managed to muster by himself, and laughed at the absurdity of so many unamused riot police standing around swarming through their gear in response to a single teenage peacemaker.

I don’t know anything about Keith, where he came from, or what compelled him to take his stand in that lonely intersection downtown. But I like to imagine that he lives in a small Midwestern town not too far from Minneapolis, and that somehow he came across an Unconventional Action paper or the RNC Welcoming Committee website which, for one reason or another, he found deeply inspiring. Maybe he read about the proposed plan: pick a sector, find out the RNC, but hadn’t explicitly discussed plans to protect downtown St. Paul, separated from the relative safety of the Mississippi riverbank when I noticed a man biking from people leisurely strolling along the Mississippi. There were throngs of protesters, walking briskly out of a building across the street, no farther than half a block away. Again we ran like wide-eyed deer in a concrete forest trying to understand an incomprehensible landscape.

We raced forward towards what I recognized with a tightness in my chest as the intersection one block from where this had started. We ran across an empty lot and turned right, away from where we had been. Downtown seemed to be an endless box without an exit, only a doorway to the next. The walls of the buildings on either side of the street were made with the type of glass characteristic of downtown high-rises. I used them to check our surroundings, and in the window of the building across the street I saw one of the men from the corner running down the street towards us, no farther than half a block away. Again we ran like wide-eyed deer in a concrete forest.

I distinctly remember thinking, “OK, it’s happening. This is what you were preparing for. This is it.” All the planning and talking, all the practicing had been for situations like this: trapped in an unfamiliar setting, with enemies at nearly every corner and a few coming for us. My mouth went dry as we ran. I looked back to see the two men about a block behind. Z and I were committed to staying together throughout the RNC, but hadn’t explicitly discussed scenarios such as this. We ran together, following each other’s lead in a fluid manner with the verbal cues—friends in struggle, in flight and flight. We took the first turn available away from the river. Another quick block and a left turn later, I surveyed the rooftops. No friendly faces in sight, and delegate bases at the end of the block with accompanying militia. The reality really set in: we were alone and in danger. Luckily, we found an alley to the right and ducked into it before the pursuers had made the pavement. The alley was a block long with a dumpster on the right and cars parked on the left. We hid in a slight alcove made by the closest car and a cut away in the building and changed our clothes as best we could. We seemed to have lost them for the moment, but weren’t beneath enough to stay where we were. I wanted to jump in the dumpster across the alley but hesitated because there was a camera nearby. I also didn’t want to be so confined. I let my idea go without sharing it with my friend, a decision I regret upon reflection. We also could have slipped underneath the cars, but without knowing where the thugs were and if or when any aid would pass our way, it didn’t seem like a smart decision to hide up where we were.

Z was ready to leave, and feeling indecisive, I went with his lead. We popped out onto the street at the far end of the alley and found another wall of bases and police to the left. We turned and walked anxiously away from them. The walls of the buildings on either side of the street were made with the type of glass characteristic of downtown high-rises.

We raced forward towards what I recognized with a tightness in my chest as the intersection one block from where this had all started. We ran across an empty lot and turned right, away from where we had been. Downtown seemed to be an endless ghost world full of hollow, metallic trees and a feeling of oppression. As we looked up into the stilled, seeing small groups of police scattered here and there, it seemed we were going to have to risk proximity to them to make it out. As I processed the possibilities, Z, a few steps ahead of me, stepped into a building and as the door closed behind him so did my hope. I saw the place as a box without an exit, only a doorway to another box—one with bars. I did not want to go in, but I didn’t feel comfortable leaving Z. In an excruciating few seconds I weighed my options and chose staying with my friend over the alley but hesitated because there was a camera nearby; I weighed my options and chose staying with my friend over the alley but hesitated because there was a camera nearby; I let my idea go without sharing it with my friend, a decision I regret upon reflection.

This is my second regret, and the one I have thought the most about since September. I know I would have understood my decision to leave him in hopes of finding sanctuary. From the beginning of the chase, if we had split up we would have been less easily identified—no longer the pair the biking man pointed out—and would have been harder to follow, giving us more freedom. The possibility of one of us getting caught would still have been high, but better one than two. I know that if we were caught it would be a lot easier to face jail and the legal system together, but I didn’t consider the fact that they would have received support either way.
way. Five tense minutes later, a cop ran up to the bus driver and yelled, “You gotta get outta here, we're gonna gas the whole area in a couple minutes!” People on the bus started yelling and cursing and, as this was the closest they would get to their destinations, getting off the bus. We did the same.

My friends and I weren’t able to get into the downtown area, much less to the jail, but we did manage to pull off a banner drop from a nearby overpass, thanks to unused materials stashed earlier that week. We had been frustrated by feelings of helplessness as we watched the pigs suit up in their fascist uniforms, but were excited by the conversations we’d overheard. They reminded us how the discussions and desires of the broader public often parallel those of anarchists in remarkable ways, requiring only the right circumstances to come to light. As attested by the participation of Seattle and Quebec residents in riots during mobilizations in those cities, the police state created at protests can provide these circumstances. In this instance, levels of repression normally reserved for poor people of color had been temporarily extended to practically everyone, and the resulting tension and resentment was electrifying. Police harassment, and the potential for resistance, became unifying rather than dividing.

It’s also worth pointing out that this police state, and the resentment it generated, was a direct result of the militant tactics used on September 1 and the embarrassment of the police after they were consistently outmaneuvered during the first few hours of the RNC. This serves as a reminder to anyone who thinks that street fighting, property destruction, and blockading alienate the public or reduce public sympathy for those who oppose authority. This conflict also shifted the focus for many outside observers from the Republican Party to the police and the state in general, demonstrating the importance of making sure our tactics match our desires.

Afterwards

Five months had passed since the convention and I was sitting down for a pancake breakfast at the local anarchist community space. The local crew was there and dozens of folks from other cities had joined us for a weekend of play and mischief. I’d met many of the people in the room through the organizing and network-building leading up to the conventions. As we were enjoying the food and each other’s company, a friend’s phone rang; a few seconds later he was cursing and slamming his fist on the table. He hung up and informed the room that warrants had been issued for two of our closest friends. There were gasps and disbelief. My heart dropped. How many times now had I felt this since the RNC, the realization and fear that people I loved could be going to prison?

Everyone immediately shifted into crisis mode. Devastated, we informed our friends about their warrants. We arranged their rides to Minneapolis and made sure lawyers and loved ones would meet them there. We raised their bail within hours. And of course we cried, held each other, and cried more.

It amazes me that a single day in September continues to shape our lives so dramatically. In the year before the convention, we declared our intention to build relationships and infrastructure that would live beyond September 1. That morning five months later proves to me that we won on that front. Despite the state’s continuing efforts to imprison our friends and lovers, the friendships and alliances that formed during the anti-RNC organizing continue to deepen, while our infrastructure for handling state repression—and attacking the state—is stronger than ever. So many of our people are currently in the clutches of our enemies, but it has become increasingly clear that we are all in this together.

Suddenly, a cop runs up to the bus driver, yelling, “You gotta get outta here, we’re gonna gas the whole area in a couple minutes!” Everyone on the bus starts yelling and cursing and, as this is the closest they’ll get to their destinations, getting out.
Repression and reformism—handcuffs and “hope”—are both strategies to discourage us from developing our own power and autonomy. Don’t let them box you in.
